The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on yesterday I offered a substitute to the pending bill which I had prepared in expectation of the cloture. I wish to say that the Committee on Agriculture met this morning and yesterday afternoon and recommended a number of important and material amendments. I do not know what final action will be taken by the committee, but I ask unanimous consent to have the substitute printed for the information of the Senate and that it may lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if what he has just presented is the substitute he offered yesterday with the amendments suggested by the committee?

Mr. GORE. Yes; I may say the amendments are embodied in the bill I now submit as a substitute.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Do I understand that the committee now recommends what the Senator presents?

Mr. GORE. No, sir; I say the committee met and considered the bill yesterday afternoon and this morning and agreed on or rather recommended these amendments. They did not take final action and authorize it to be reported as a substitute. The committee may probably meet again to consider that proposition.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment, as I understand, is not an amendment to the bill, but a proposed substitute.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; perfecting, I might say, the substitute; but I do not officially report it from the committee as yet.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 22, line 11, to change the number of the section from "19" to "18."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 18. That for the purposes of this act the sum of $150,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available during the time this act is in effect: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purposes described in the preceding section.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having charge of the bill if there was any estimate made showing that $150,000,000 will be all that will be necessary for this purpose?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there was no estimate presented to the committee or to any member of it, so far as I know, but the $150,000,000 was thought by those who have the bureau in charge—Mr. Hoover and his advisers—to be enough. My own opinion is that it will not be enough. It is, however, to be used as a revolving fund, and it is probable that as the commodities are bought and disposed of the fund might be sufficient. I do not know whether or not it will be.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suppose that Mr. Hoover decided upon $150,000,000 at the time when the bill was to include only foods, feeds, and fuel, but we have added to the bill since then petroleum and its products, aluminum and its products, hides, skins, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, hemp, jute, cotton, wool, and sisal and their products, lead, timber, lumber, or the joint product or products of two or more of the said materials, farm implements and machinery, and fertilizers and fertilizer ingredients.

It is perfectly apparent that $150,000,000 will be a mere bagatelle if the provisions of this bill as amended are to be carried out. Mr. President, $150,000,000 would not purchase what wheat will be offered within the next two or three months. To try to administer this bill, including all the products named in it, with $150,000,000 would simply be absurd.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator does not think the appropriation in this bill would undertake to purchase all the wheat, does he?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that unless some other market is allowed to be developed the United States will certainly have to purchase all the wheat that is offered, and I have no doubt but that 60 days after the wheat crop is harvested and ready for market there will be over $150,000,000 worth of wheat alone offered, which somebody has got to purchase.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why does the Senator think the Government will have to purchase all of the wheat under the provisions of this bill? If the bill is so drawn that the Government will have to purchase all of the wheat, ought we not to amend the bill so that such a necessity would not exist?

Mr. SMOOT. I think we ought to amend the bill—there is not a question about that—but the Senator from Georgia must know that if the farmer's market is destroyed, as it is to-day, and there is a price put upon the wheat at which it shall be purchased by the Government, of course, the Government will have to take all wheat offered; it will have to handle it as any other purchaser would, and will sell it at a price fixed by it to purchasers in the United States and to our allies; and that is the program already mapped out. I am not complaining, for it may be the Government will be a better customer for the farmer than he has to-day; and if that is what the Senate wants and Congress is going to authorize, then I want the Congress of the United States to appropriate sufficient money so that the men administering the law can do so without question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, has the Senator from Utah pointed out to the Senate why this bill would destroy the entire market for wheat?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one word more: If he has done so, then, if he can show that clearly, does he not think that it will appeal to the Senate and that the Senate will be ready to so modify the bill as not to destroy the farmer's market?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia must know that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and several other Senators have spoken upon that very subject matter and have called the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is not a question but that the wheat market is destroyed to-day. The Senator from Minnesota particularly called attention to the three purchasers of wheat that the farmer has to-day, and also called attention to the fact that those purchasers, for fear of the passage of this bill, would not buy wheat to-day, and if that continues the Government of the United States would be the only purchaser of wheat. I have not heard it disputed by the public press or by anyone else that the program is to be that not one of our allies or any neutral countries can buy a bushel of American wheat except through the bureau which is to be created under this bill. If that be true, where is the market for wheat other than the one we are providing now?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would not the general American market still remain?

Mr. SMOOT. There would remain the little local markets, where the wheat is used for local consumption.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. I asked the Senator that question not by way of argument but rather to draw out a discussion from him upon the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I admit that gristmills that simply grind wheat for people within the city or county in which the gristmill is located no doubt would buy wheat from the farmer to carry on their small business and to provide enough flour for local consumption; but so far as exportations are concerned, and so far as the market for flour or wheat which goes into interstate commerce to any extent is concerned, there would be only the one purchaser.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator one more question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator permit me to proceed for one moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would not the foreign countries that buy, if they would buy with the United States, furnish a fund entirely outside of this fund; and is not this fund solely intended to handle domestic consumption?

Again, I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that I am not asking these questions argumentatively, but rather to have them discussed, for I agree with the Senator that we have no right to destroy the wheat growers' market, and if we do so we should put up enough money to take care of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I admit that this appropriation is intended as a revolving fund, but the Senator from Georgia knows enough about the market to understand that somebody has got to advance the money to the farmer, for the farmer has got to sell his wheat when harvested in order to pay the debts that he owes to the local store and to the bank from which he may have borrowed money. The farmer has only one pay day in the year, and that pay day comes when he harvests his wheat and other products. Then he must pay his obligations. I admit that we should not appropriate all the money necessary to buy all the wheat produced in this country. If we did, $150,000,000 would be a mere bagatelle for the wheat crop alone. There must be a certain amount of wheat carried the same as it has been carried by the trade in the past, and it must be distributed as it is called for, the same as in the past.

I admit, of course, that when our allies buy from the bureau created under this bill they have got to pay the money for it, and that would be a part of the revolving fund; but I am speaking now of the $150,000.000 that is supposed to take care of the payments that are absolutely necessary for all the wheat and all of the other articles mentioned in this bill, if it becomes necessary in order to control them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question, which I have been trying to ask him?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield first to the Senator from North Dakota, and then I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want the Senator to realize that from the time the earlier crops are thrashed for the market and begin to come in until the crops are ready for the market in the North will cover substantially three months of time, that the Government will have simply announced the price that it will pay, and that that will necessarily fix the price for all grain coming from the crop of that season, whether it is hauled in a hurry or whether it is hauled in two or three or six months. The Government can not possibly get hold of the actual grain to the amount of $100,000,000 by any possibility, or $50,000,000, or probably even $25,000,000 worth. Therefore, while it is buying the first wheat and getting possession of the physical bushels of wheat, it will be turning it off at the same time for the purposes for which it has purchased. So I do not think there will be any danger whatever of $150,000,000 not being sufficient to cover all of these things.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator's ideas as to the amount of business that is covered under the provisions of this bill and mine are radically different. I can take, for instance, the one product of wool and its products. While most of that article has been sold this year for fabulous prices, if the Government of the United States undertook to control the wool in this country and its products, what would $100,000,000 amount to in purchasing it? It would be a mere bagatelle for that one item alone, without the innumerable other articles named in the bill, covering nearly all the business of this country.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether there is anything in this bill that requires the Government to buy except for the purpose of guaranteeing a minimum price?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Government guarantees a minimum price, in view of the authority and the directions given in this bill, the only way it can guarantee that price is to buy the product, and that is exactly what they would do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; that is true; but the question of supply and demand would always come in as tending to make a higher price than the minimum, and we are not going to fix as the minimum price the regular market price. So I doubt very much whether the Government will have to buy any of the product.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, let me call attention to a condition that I have been told existed in the month of May. The neutral countries were buying wheat in that month, and wheat went up to three dollars and some odd cents a bushel—nearly $3.25—through the neutrals buying and competing for American wheat. If reports are true, the neutral countries were told that they must cease buying American wheat, and that, if they did not do so, an embargo would be placed upon it and they could not get the wheat. They were also advised to unload the wheat they had purchased if reports be true. Those who have followed the wheat market must know that the price of wheat began to decline from that time on, and has declined over a dollar a bushel.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How much of that maximum price did the farmers get, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I can not tell when the wheat was sold. If the farmer did not sell his wheat, but held it until the price rose to $3.25, he got perhaps whatever the price was, less commission and freight to Chicago or some other grain center. But if he sold right after thrashing, I do not believe he got much more than $1.50 a bushel.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I saw in the newspapers a statement, I think from Mr. Hoover, that the average price which the farmer received was $1.51, whereas the speculators got as high as $3.15. Now, if the minimum price on wheat is put at $1.50, which is indicated in his interviews, I do not believe that there will be any sales to the Government, because I believe other purchasers will be ready to take the wheat off the market at $1.60 or $2 or even $2.25, and consequently I think this appropriation will be amply sufficient for the purposes intended.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely desire to respond to the statement made by the Senator from Colorado. I think the Senator misunderstands Mr. Hoover's declaration. The farmers, of course, for the entire crop may have received an average of $1.51; but certainly the Senator can not estimate the middleman's profit as the difference between $1.51 and the highest market price for wheat, because there was a gradual rise all along, and the speculator bought and sold. At first he only sold for a little—perhaps 3 cents or 4 cents a bushel—higher than the farmer's price, with freight, and therefore the quantity influenced by speculation was but a few million bushels at the very most.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What the Senator now says is true. There was a gradual increase up to the maximum, I think, of $3.25 a bushel; but the average would be somewhere in the neighborhood of $2.50 or $2.60; and if that is the average, then the difference between $1.51 and $2.50 would be the profit the middleman and the speculator received.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator's average is too high.

Mr. SMOOT. The trouble with the Senator from Colorado is that his average of what wheat has been selling for for the last year as compared with what the farmer received is altogether too high. He can not figure that wheat during the year 1917 has averaged $2.50 a bushel, sale price. That is the weakness in the Senator's argument. I know, and I presume the Senator knows, that if the farmer held his wheat until May, as the speculators did who bought it perhaps a few months before—and I do not know what they may have given for the wheat; but certainly a great deal more than when it was harvested, because they are always turning over sales—but if the farmer had kept his wheat until May and the wheat had been in his bin, there is no question that he would have received over $2.50 a bushel for it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But, as a usual rule, the farmer does not do that. The farmer sells reasonably soon after the harvest.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I have already said. There is no question about that. There is no difference between the Senator and myself upon that point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the other question that I desire to ask the Senator is this: I realize fully the necessity of the farmer having a market for at least a large part of that portion of his crop which he intends to sell shortly after he harvests it.

Like the cotton farmer, his big crop is harvested practically altogether. He has spent his money to produce it; he has to pay up his obligations; and must sell part of the crop to pay his obligations. Now, what is there in this bill that will eliminate entirely the usual purchaser, and why is it that the men to whom the Senator refers who usually buy will not buy; and if they will not, what changes ought to be made in the bill to free that market and produce something like normal conditions?

Mr. SMOOT. Now, let us take the three purchasers that the farmer has had in the past and see where he stands to-day. First, was the gristmill. To-day the miller is not buying wheat to store it. The miller dare not push his mill to its utmost capacity and pile up a surplus stock of flour. The flour that is being sold to-day to the people of the United States is from the surplus stock of the gristmills of this country. The millers are not buying wheat to-day to make flour to sell at some future time; they are not accepting large orders for exportation, and then buying on the stock exchange enough wheat to protect them; so that it is impossible for them to lose if wheat should advance. That has all stopped. Now they are selling from their surplus stock, and I presume that to-day there is less flour held by the mills in the United States than there has been at any time for almost a quarter of a century.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like——

Mr. SMOOT. That is only one part of the answer to the question of the Senator from Georgia, and if the Senator from Colorado will allow me to complete the answer, I will yield to him.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Right there I should like to ask the Senator, Is not that condition of the market now due to the fact that no minimum price has been fixed, and it is not known what the minimum price will be? If the minimum price should be $2.50, of course it would make a different condition than if it were $1.50. Consequently it is due to the chaotic condition and to the fact that this bill has not been passed so that a minimum price can be fixed that the market is in the disturbed condition to which the Senator refers.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, with a bureau able to fix the price of flour, with an administration having the power to say that no flour or wheat shall be exported from this country, and at the same time to fix a minimum price for wheat, who is going to handle it? The business men of the country are not going to purchase wheat unless they can make one or two or three cents a bushel upon it; and where are they going to find a market? If a minimum price is fixed, the farmer is not going to sell his wheat for any less than the minimum price, because he knows that he can get that price from the Government of the United States; and, of course, if that is the case, the farmer is not going to sell his wheat to anyone for less than he can get from the Government, and therefore there will be no incentive for a person to purchase the wheat.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope Senators will allow the Senator from Utah to answer my second question.

Mr. REED. I want to contribute something on this particular matter, but I will wait.

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield to the Senator from Missouri. I will not forget to answer the question of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have been told, on pretty good authority I think, that a potential gentleman has said that if this bill should pass, his method of controlling the market would be that if the wheat began to go too high he would go into the exchanges and sell wheat in sufficient quantities to put the price down. Mr. President, if anybody wants to grant that kind of power to an individual, and furnish him the money of the United States to go in and bull and bear the market, and then thinks that there will be any legitimate buying or selling upon the market and that business will not be generally disrupted, that individual and myself can not think in the same way.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, replying further to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], we will take the second market that the farmer has depended upon in the past, and that is the grain exchange. Under this bill there is not to be allowed any speculating in grain on the grain exchange where in the past there has been an unlimited market for wheat. In the past a miller would sell, say, 10,000 barrels of flour. He can not run the risk of wheat going up, and he does not know whether it is going to decline, but he makes the sale to be delivered within three months, we will say. In the past the miller has gone to the grain exchange and purchased for delivery as he wanted it during the following three months, enough wheat to make that 10,000 barrels of flour, and he pays a small commission for the privilege. That will all cease in the future. It is just the same with the cotton manufacturer. He sells his goods six months before the time of delivery. He must sell them. He takes his orders before ever a yard of the goods is made for delivery, and the first thing he does is to go into the cotton exchange and buy enough cotton to make the goods he has sold, at a price based upon the selling price of his goods. He can not run the chance of cotton advancing, and the only way that he has to protect himself to-day is to do just what he has been doing for a quarter of a century or more. Either that or he must have money sufficient to buy enough cotton at once with which to make the goods he has already sold.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or he must be a speculator and take the chances of trade.

Mr. SMOOT. Or he must take the chance of an advance in cotton, and if a sharp advance in cotton did come up would go his business.

The farmers other market has been the foreign one. In the past the farmers have enjoyed the competition of all purchasers of all the foreign countries of the world. If Sweden wanted wheat more than Denmark, Sweden would bid more for the wheat than Denmark. If England wanted wheat more than France, England would bid more than France, and the highest bidder got the wheat; trade took its regular course, and there was no interference with it. Now, however, that is to be changed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is already changed.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; as the Senator from Georgia says, that is already changed by the embargo act. The farmer has no foreign purchasers to bid for his wheat. Now, there is only one purchaser, and the Senator must know that without a foreign market and with more wheat raised in this country than it is possible for the American people to consume prices would not go above the minimum price named. That would be next to impossible. Therefore the Government would be compelled to purchase at the minimum price.

That is the situation, and it is for those reasons that I say that $150,000,000 is not sufficient, if we are going to carry out the provisions of this bill. I am speaking now of the $150,000,000 to cover only food, feeds, and fuel, the three items originally included in the bill; but when we have added all these other items, covering practically all the business of the United States, to appropriate $150,000,000 for the purpose of controlling or of purchasing even an infinitesimal part of the products of this country would be utterly inadequate, a mere bagatelle.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will it interrupt the Senator for me to suggest one thought that is in my mind, which, I think, indicates that the price might go above the minimum in spite even of these conditions?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is this: It is known that a large quantity must be shipped abroad, even if only one purchaser handles it; that it will leave in this country certainly not more, probably less, than will be required for a normal, free use of the commodity. Therefore the knowledge of the fact that the private demand for what is left in this country will probably be more than the quantity left here would be calculated to stimulate the price. I agree that the conditions the Senator stated, unless that is true, would put wheat certainly not above the minimum price.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's reasoning is correct if there was not a further control. If the price of flour was not to be controlled, the Senator's reasoning would be absolutely correct; but the price at which flour is to be sold is to be controlled, and the decision is to be arrived at in this way: It will take so many bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. It costs so much to make that wheat into flour. Therefore, with wheat at $2 a bushel, a barrel of flour costs just so much money, and the profit, or whatever is agreed upon, will be added, and it can not be sold for more.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only meant to carry my thought to the extent that the mere embargo would not hold the wheat down to the minimum price.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right, if it was a mere embargo.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I was asking the consideration of the Senator to the features of the bill that affect the domestic market. We must keep that in mind. The embargo is a war measure. I think that all agree we must support the embargo.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The question in my mind is, How can we modify anything that is affecting the local market so as to remove this burden upon the local wheat grower, and yet preserve those features of the bill that seek to prevent extortion?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course I did not rise to speak upon that phase of the bill, though I may do so before I get through.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. What I was interested in was this: I never like to vote for an appropriation to carry out any bill when I know the appropriation is not enough. We have seen it a thousand times down here. We have seen bureaus started with a promise that the expense of maintaining them would not be more than $25,000 a year, and we have seen them grow until they have cost over $300,000 a year; and I have seen appropriations of $100,000 asked for here when anybody that knew the subject matter knew that it would have taken a million dollars to carry them out. Then, after we have made the appropriation of $100,000, and after we have started upon the scheme, we can not help but make further appropriations; and we go on and pile it up, and when the million-dollar mark is reached there is something added to it, and it must be increased; and there is no telling when it will end.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. But, of course, I recognize that to-day a million dollars is such a little, nasty, contemptible amount of money that it is not worth spending a minute's time in considering. Anything less than a billion is to-day considered too small an amount to haggle over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was wondering if the Senator wanted a billion in this?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Utah would be a good argument against providing for a bureau at all; but it seems to me that when they come and ask for $150,000,000, for him to say that he wants to increase it to double or treble or quadruple that amount is not wise. We do not know that the position the Senator is taking is going to prove to be true, and consequently we had better appropriate only the $150,000,000, instead of appropriating double or treble or quadruple that amount. If it turns out that it is required, Congress is in session all the time and will be ready to respond if it is deemed wise, and Congress ought to hold somewhat of a check upon the appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator could not have been here a short time ago when I touched upon this very subject that he now brings up. You say that Mr. Hoover asked for $150,000,000. Grant that it is true; but when Mr. Hoover asked for $150,000,000 all that he ever thought would be covered in this bill was foods, feeds, and fuel. Since that time the Senate has added nearly every product manufactured in the United States; and if it took $150,000,000 to handle foods, feeds, and fuel, does the Senator from Colorado think that with all the balance of the products of the United States it could be handled for the same amount?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I must say that if Mr. Hoover or the Government wanted more than $150,000,000 they would manifest their desire here. I want to ask the Senator a question: Does he believe in giving $300,000,000 or $900,000,000 or $1,200,000,000 at this place and for this purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah believes that if we are going to pass a bill and lead the American people to believe that all the products they produce shall be taken care of by the Government of the United States, it is nothing more than fair to them that the Government of the United States shall provide the money to pay for them and carry out the provisions of the bill in good faith; and I know that the Government of the United States can not carry it out and do that with all of the items that are put in this bill with an appropriation of $150,000,000.

Therefore, I am in favor of increasing it, if we are going to pass the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator from Utah can compose his soul. If the bill is about to pass in this enlarged form, Mr. Hoover will send down word that he wants a few billions more, and opposition will vanish like mist before the sun. I think even our friend from Colorado will be found enthusiastically supporting the proposition.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. However, I, of course, will pause now for the Senator from Colorado to tell us what his position might be.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I believe this $150,000,000 is sufficient. I believe, as a matter of fact, that not that amount will be used. The bill provides only for the minimum price to be fixed by the Government, and provides for the Government taking over only in the event that wheat or other products are lower than that minimum price.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. SHAFROTH. For that reason, I do not believe that the Government will have to buy any.

Mr. REED. There is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is a provision fixing and guaranteeing the minimum price. When the question as to appropriation comes up I am rather inclined to scrutinize appropriations pretty closely, and I do not want any more than are necessary, and if I believe that an appropriation is asked that is greater than is needed I must say that I feel that I will vote against any such increased appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I feel that I shall do my duty to the American people when I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if this bill passes with present items in it and the bureau is to execute the law $150,000,000 will be a mere bagatelle. The Senator from Colorado knows too well my position in relation to extravagant appropriations; he has served on the Appropriations Committee with me long enough to know that there is no one in this body that scrutinizes the money appropriated any more than the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I must say that in my association with the Senator from Utah on the Committee on Appropriations he has nearly always been in favor of lower appropriations. For that reason I was utterly astonished to find that the Senator on this occasion was talking about increasing the amount from $150,000,000 to two or three times that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Colorado is too intelligent a man and too clever a business man to think for a minute that if it took $150,000,000 to carry out the provisions of this bill when it included only foods, feeds, and fuels, when we have added to it every other product of the country—yes; ten times more than the original amount—that the administration can be done with the same amount of appropriation. I know that the Senator, if he will stop to think of it, will say that it is an impossible thing to do. I should be delighted if it could be done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I know the economical tendencies of the Senator from Utah; and I venture the assertion that if an amendment were made to this bill to increase this amount even $50,000,000, he would vote against it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator could not say that after what I have said, unless he has an idea in the back of his head that this bill is not going to pass in its present form. I will say to the Senator that if this bill is to pass in its present form, and includes all of the items provided for now in the bill, not only would I vote for $50,000,000 but I would vote for $300,000,000 for it, because I know that we would have to provide the money for it, and I know that a deficiency would be asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury, as all other deficiencies are, as it will be an utter impossibility to administer this bill in its present shape with $150,000,000 or $300,000,000 if it would have taken $150,000,000 in the first instance.

I wanted to call attention to that fact so that if this bill passes and there is an appropriation asked for of $500,000,000 in the form of a deficiency no one can point to me if I object to it and say, "Why did you not call the attention of the Senate to it when the bill was under consideration?" I have done so, Mr. President; and I know, just as well as I know that I live, that if this bill passes and these items remain in the bill, and if it is administered as it ought to be, it will not cost $150,000,000, but it will cost half a billion dollars.

I have said all that I care to say about this item. I do not expect to see a change made in it. Perhaps it will be said, as it has been said in other instances when appropriations have been made that were insufficient to cover what we knew would be the expense, that it is far better when we meet in December to make an appropriation, even though it be a deficiency, than to provide for it at this time. Now, I do not like that kind of legislation. If I vote for a bill, I want to vote also at the same time for sufficient money to carry the provisions of the bill out.

If that policy were followed to-day, it would save this Government millions and millions of dollars. Under the law, no officer of our Government has a right to make a deficiency, and yet there is not a single session of Congress but that deficiencies are made—first a deficiency bill, then an urgency deficiency bill, then another urgency deficiency bill, and I do not know how many will yet pass the Senate at this session of Congress.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator stated, if I understood him correctly, that it would cost half a billion dollars to execute this law. What evidence has the Senator that it would cost that much money? Has the Senator any information as to how the men who wrote this bill reached the conclusion that it would take $150,000,000? I have never been able to get any information at all on that subject, and I have made a great many inquiries. Of course I do not charge that an investigation has not been made and the figures which appear in the bill are incorrect. All that I contend is I have not seen the figures and the facts, and they have not been given to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will indulge me just a moment, when this bill was reported to Congress the men who expect to administer it stated that it would cost $150,000,000. Included in the bill then were foods, feeds, and fuels. Now, we have added these items: Aluminum and its products, hides, skins, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, hemp, jute, cotton, wool, sisal, and their products, lead, timber, lumber, or the joint product or products of two or more of the said materials, farm implements and machinery, and fertilizers and fertilizer ingredients. Now, I say to the Senator that if it cost $150,000,000 to administer the bill as it was reported to Congress, in which was included only foods, feeds, and fuels, to include all of these items I have not a doubt that it will take more than half a billion dollars.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think the Senator's reasoning is logical; but has the Senator any information upon which to base the statement that it is going to cost $150,000,000? I understand that that is just what the proponents or authors of this bill stated that it would cost, without giving any data upon which Congress could reach an independent conclusion on the subject at all. I am willing to accept the food dictator's opinion on many things—most things connected with this bill—but I must not be blamed or censured if I occasionally hang out an interrogation point.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I think the $150,000,000, even for the administration of the bill as it was reported to Congress, is too little.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator from North Dakota. I think the Senator from North Dakota the other day made the statement that $150,000,000 was not sufficient.

Mr. GRONNA. I can not agree with the Senator from Mississippi, nor can I agree with the Senator from Utah. As I understand this fund, it is a revolving fund, not an expense fund. It is a fund to be used as a purchasing fund.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I said.

Mr. GRONNA. And it is supposed that we are not to lose anything. Unless the buyer, the man who is to administer this law, does not understand his business, the Government is supposed not to lose anything. The expense fund in the bill is the two and a half millions. That is the only money that is appropriated for expense.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will revise his statement as to not agreeing with me. I have said time and again that this is a revolving fund, and I have not even intimated that the Government of the United States would not receive from the wheat that it purchases every dollar that it costs; but I have contended that with all these items, if they are to be purchased by the Government, revolving fund as it is, it is not sufficient for the Government's purchases.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me, I do not disagree with the Senator from Utah in his statement that if all these articles are to be included $150,000,000 would be insufficient capital to handle the entire industry.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, this fund revolves. It changes form. It is used over and over again.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that it is not an expense fund.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not see why it should take such an enormous fund, if the investments the Government makes shall be realized on, and the money used to buy wheat to-day, converted into money to-morrow, and the money used again next day. It seems to me it should not take such a large amount if it is going to be used in that way. It will be ample unless it is going to be used also in the employment of men to gather statistics and data, and paid out in that way. A prodigious amount of business can be conducted with $150,000,000 if wisely and prudently used.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, the $2,500,000 provides for that. Of course under this provision, however, it could be spent even for other purposes than buying and holding the products named in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. Hoover stated before the committee, and there is no secret about it and no need of beating around the bush about it, that this fund of $150,000,000 was a revolving fund to buy wheat.

Now, of course, if all these other matters were to be purchased, it would not be enough.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, there is no doubt at all about it.

Mr. KENYON. But I want to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to one thing, if I may, while I am on my feet.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. He continually refers to the fact that only foods, feeds, and fuels were covered in the original bill. I want to call his attention to the fact that it also covered "articles required for their production," which of course includes nearly everything as now defined in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose there is no question in the mind of any Senator, and particularly in the minds of the members of the committee, but that Mr. Hoover stated before the committee that the object of the appropriation was to purchase wheat.

Mr. KENYON. That was what the $150,000,000 was for. He was asked that, and said that. There is no question about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and as I stated in my remarks, I believe that every penny of the $150,000,000 will be necessary to handle the wheat of this country, even though it be a revolving fund.

Mr. President, I do not want to take any more of the time of the Senate, but I felt that I ought to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if the bill passes in its present form it would be unjust to Mr. Hoover or any other man who may be placed in a position to administer the law to ask him to do so with this appropriation only provided for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon offers the following amendment:

"The appropriation specified in this section and in section 16 of this act shall be immediately available and shall be paid out on the order of the President or on the order of such officer or officers as may be designated by him for that purpose, which order of the President, or of such officer, shall be conclusive and binding upon all departments and the accounting officers of the Government as to the correctness of said accounts and disbursements.

"In order to provide for necessary office accommodations and facilities for the use of any agency or agencies which may be created or used by the President in carrying into effect the provisions of this act, the President may, in his discretion, cause to be constructed a temporary office, building, or buildings upon any lands owned by the United States within the District of Columbia not required for other governmental uses and which may be designated by him, and construct such temporary office, building, or buildings thereon. For these purposes the President may utilize and expend so much of said appropriation as may be necessary, not exceeding the sum of $200,000.

"Provided further, That itemized statements covering all purchases and disbursements under this and the preceding section shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives on or before the 10th day of each month after the taking effect of this act, covering the business of the preceding month, and said statements shall be subject to public inspection."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire a division of that amendment. I should like a separate vote upon the first proposition and then a separate vote on the second one.

The first one provides $200,000 for the building of a temporary office building in Washington, and if the other members of the Appropriations Committee and myself are correctly informed, they have already selected a point on which this building shall be erected near the Senate Office Building, upon ground owned by the Government of the United States. Now, the idea of appropriating $200,000 for a temporary building, to be torn down just as soon as the war ceases, is extravagance that can not be defended, when we can rent the old Census Building, with ample room for every employee that will be employed under the provisions of this bill. We had the Census Bureau in that building for years, and, while I forget exactly how many employees they had, certainly they had as many as will be employed under this bill. A mere tithe of the amount that is asked here to put up a building will pay the rent for at least two years for that building.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have other buildings, too.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; as the Senator from North Carolina states, we have other buildings that they can go into, and that will cost us nothing at all for rent.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. JONES of Washington addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Who recommends the erection of this temporary building?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment was sent to the committee, I suppose, through the regular channels.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know; but what department, what officer of the Government, recommended it? Whose testimony was taken in regard to it?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall have to ask the Senator from Oregon to answer that question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the chairman of the committee tell me?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, we went all over that once this morning. Mr. Hoover and Judge Lindsey appeared before the committee and explained to the committee that they had been unable to find quarters to occupy for the purposes proposed in this act, and that temporary quarters would have to be erected for them; and upon their recommendation the committee suggested this amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, do we not own a lot of buildings down here next to the Maltby Building?

Mr. SMOOT. We do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why can not those buildings be used?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think they are fine enough.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But, as I understand, they are going to put this temporary building out here on the Plaza. And my recollection is that we own all of these buildings down here to the alley this side of the Driscoll Hotel.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. All of those buildings along there connected with the Maltby Building we own, and I understand that the Maltby Building is being used now for some purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH rose.

Mr. SMOOT. It is partly used; and, as the defender of the Maltby Building, I introduce the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I hope the Maltby Building will be used. It is a good five-story building.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me the Maltby Building and those other buildings along there, all owned by the Government, could be put to good use.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are 20 or 30 of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Every inch of space ought to be used.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are 20 or 30 residences there that are now occupied temporarily; and, besides that, facing upon the other street there is a good-sized school building that has been occupied in the past year and is in good repair, and there are other buildings facing upon that court there. I can not see why they can not find, not palatial quarters, but quarters with good roofs on them and good heating apparatus. I do not see why they can not utilize those buildings.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not say anything more. I think it is so apparent that this ought not to go into the bill that I am willing to submit it to a vote of the Senate right now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My attention was called to the fact here by a member of the committee that the appropriation ought to have been $150,000 instead of $200,000. The amount of $200,000 was discussed while in committee, but it was fixed at $150,000. I wish to make that change in the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Senators serving here have occupied quarters in the Maltby Building for years.

Mr. SMOOT. I did so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Utah was there, and I was there, and a number of Senators occupied quarters there. They were good enough for anyone. I think we ought to strike out the second paragraph of this amendment. We have ample buildings, and if this food-administration company want to have something more elaborate than we have now, Senators can very easily vacate the Senate Office Building, or perhaps the Supreme Court room might be borrowed. There is nothing going on there and there is a throne and ample space there for garbing these people appropriately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first part of the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The first part of the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. The second part of the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that the second part be read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The second part is the part which appertains to itemizing and reports to the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add, at the end of line 16, after the word "section" and before the period, the following proviso:

Provided further, That itemized statements covering all purchases and disbursements under this and the preceding section shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives on or before the 10th day of each month after the taking effect of this act, covering the business of the preceding month, and said statements shall be subject to public inspection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the second part of the amendment.

The second part of the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 16, to strike out:

SEC. 20. That the employment of any person under the provisions of this act shall not exempt any such person from military service under the provisions of the selective draft law approved May 18, 1917.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not ask to have a record vote upon it, but I do not like to have the amendment agreed to without objection. I ought to state that I have a strong objection to the action of the committee. The House provision should be agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why that was stricken out?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Because the selective-draft act covers the whole subject.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand under the selective draft law the President could exempt all these employees if he saw fit to do so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certain classes of men—for instance, customhouse clerks—were definitely named in the act. Those were exempt from the service, and all other Government employees could be called on for voluntary military service as they might be utilized in connection with the national defense.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then the employees in this temporary service could be put on the same basis as the permanent employees.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; temporarily, while they are in the Government employ.

Mr. SMOOT. As I said, I am not going to ask for a yea and nay vote on this amendment, but as the employees under this bill will be temporary, perhaps to be in the Government service not over one year, I can not see why they should be exempt from draft. If it affected the administration of the provisions of the act, if it affected the Government in any way, there would be some excuse for it, but I can not see why they should not be drafted the same as many other employees of the Government will be.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of my colleague does he interpret the bill as exempting the employees under the bill from military service?

Mr. SMOOT. In my opinion it can not have any other effect.

Mr. KING. I understood from the Senator in charge of the bill this morning that a general statute covers all Government employees, and that none as a class are exempt from the operation of the selective-draft act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In order that Senators may understand just what the law is, let me call attention to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Section 4 of the act to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States provides—

That the Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes:

Now, the act mentions them:

County and municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mail; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States.

Then it mentions the other classes.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember the law as the Senator has read it; but the House put in section 20 so that there could be no question but that the employees under the provisions of the bill would fall under the same draft law as all the other employees of the Government. But this bill, if it becomes a law, will have passed Congress after the passage of the draft act of May 18, 1917, and the House thought the best and surest way was to specifically state in this law that all the employees shall fall under the draft law of May 18, 1917.

Mr. LODGE. I think also, Mr. President, that the intent of the House was to prevent persons employed under this act taking advantage of their position to claim exemption on the ground of Government service. As to the other people now in the service, the President can grant exemption or not as he pleases, but this would prevent them, I think, from claiming exemption on the ground of Government service. I think it is a great mistake to strike it out. It makes a home for slackers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I agree with the expression of the Senator from Massachusetts and my colleague, the senior Senator from Utah. In this connection I wish to speak of an experience which doubtless most, if not all, Senators have had. It is a fact that many young men wholly unpatriotic are seeking service in the Government now, hoping thereby to escape conscription. Almost every day applications are made to some, if not all, Senators.

Mr. LODGE. We all get them. I think it is a very undesirable class, and I do not want to extend it.

Mr. KING. I certainly hope that the President of the United States will signify at a very early moment that few of those who are in the Government's service and who are amenable to draft shall be excused from the operation of the law. Personally I should like to see the House provision adhered to.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I wish to say that I had a young man call upon me the other day who asked me to get him a position in the Government service. He said, "I do not care what wages they pay me; I am perfectly willing, if necessary, to work for $50 a month." I had never met him before in my life; he came with a letter of introduction from a friend of mine here in Washington. I asked him right out, "Why do you want to work for the Government?" He said, "If I get employment in the Government service, they can not draft me."

Mr. KENYON. The committee, I am sure, struck out this provision because they thought there was no question that these people would be subject to the draft. If there is any question about it the committee amendment ought to stay in, and I think I shall vote to keep it in.

Mr. LODGE. It can do no harm to keep it in.

Mr. KENYON. No.

Mr. LODGE. If it is superfluous or a duplication it is no harm in my judgment. It takes from the employee the right to make claim for exemption on that ground.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Whether it is in or out, the President still has the right under the power we gave him to exempt. He can do it on any ground.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, he may do it on any other ground, but not on the ground of Government service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee striking out section 20, page 22, lines 17 to 21, inclusive.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 22, to change the number of the section from "21" to "18."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 9, to strike out:

SEC. 22. That if any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this act shall for any reason be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder thereof, but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof, directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 16, to insert:

SEC. 19. That words used in this act shall be construed to import the plural or the singular, as the case demands. The word "person," wherever used in this act, shall include individuals, partnerships, associations, and corporations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 21, to change the number of the section from "23" to "20."

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill has been completed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There were one or two amendments passed over at the request of Senators. I think the Senator from Missouri requested that the amendment inserting section 3 be passed over.

Mr. REED. Section 3 is very important. If there is any possibility of the committee amendment being rejected as it is printed, I want to be heard. But I make this suggestion to the chairman of the committee. I understand every amendment of the committee is disposed of now except one. Is not that correct?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think there were one or two provisions that went over; I am not sure. I ask the Secretary what other provision was passed over?

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 2, after the word "both," the committee report to insert:

Provided, That such operations, practices, and transactions, at, on, or in or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or other similar institution or place of business, as are not prohibited by the regulations made by the President, pursuant to the provisions of this section, shall not be deemed to be within the intent and meaning of section 6 of this act.

Mr. REED. I object to the last clause.

Mr. NORRIS. On what page is that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Page 16, line 2, at the end of section 10. It is an amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. REED. Let it be read again, please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On section 10, beginning on page 14, on page 16, after the penalty clause, line 2, after the word "both," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That such operations, practices, and transactions, at, on, or in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or other similar institution or place of business, as are not prohibited by the regulations made by the President, pursuant to the provisions of this section, shall not be deemed to be within the intent and meaning of section 6 of this act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I will state the purpose of that amendment. It was suggested by Judge Lindsey. The object is to remove any doubt which might arise in construing section 6 in connection with section 10. Section 10 contemplates that ordinary course of trading in exchanges and boards of trades in commodities which may for the time being be deemed not to require regulation, should not be inhibited by the regulation, and thus if you can take section 10 standing alone, it would be perfectly legal.

If at any time the President desires to place any given operation, practice, or transaction on the prohibited list, he may do so, but until he does so, business should be permitted to proceed on customary lines.

The proposed amendment would remove any ambiguity between the two sections, and it was for that reason that this amendment was put in. In other words, there was fear that the two sections taken together would put even legitimate exchanges out of business.

Mr. REED. Then the proviso ought to be to section 6 instead of section 10. I have not given it careful study. Who is Judge Lindsey?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He is quite a prominent western lawyer. I have only met him recently. I will state to the Senator that he suggested it did not make any difference whether it was put on section 6 or section 10, but at the request of some members of the committee we fixed the amendment so as to attach it to section 10.

Mr. REED. Since I made the inquiry of the Senator as to Judge Lindsey I have been informed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that Judge Lindsey is very well and very favorably known in the profession. I make that statement because my inquiry a moment ago might seem to indicate that I was raising a question as to his ability. I did not mean to do that. There might be a thousand Judge Lindseys, and I wanted to identify the man. I do not make any objection to this amendment under the explanation that has been made.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but I do not think we ought to adopt this amendment in the form in which it has been presented by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator, as he will probably remember, that the amendment was not prepared by me, but was prepared by Judge Lindsey himself, after having taken these sections together, and after having gone over them carefully.

Mr. GRONNA. I was going to come to that, Mr. President. It is not a committee amendment; it is an amendment suggested by Mr. Hoover or by his attorney. If I understand the amendment correctly, it will permit transactions on boards of trade, the buying and selling of grain, according to rules and regulations adopted by such exchange; but at the same time it would not allow outside of the board of trade, or permit an individual, say a miller, or an individual engaged in some other business, to buy the actual grain and store it. I think we ought to give the matter a little more consideration.

The amendment legalizes and permits transactions which we have condemned in the strongest terms, but it does not permit of legitimate transactions. Although I am a member of the committee and would like to support the Senator in charge of the bill, because he certainly has worked diligently and has done everything possible to make this bill as good as it can be made, I shall have to vote against it. I do not think the amendment in its present form ought to be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, which has been read by the Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment be again stated. If the amendment really does what the Senator from North Dakota says it does, I think it is a very serious matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 2, after the word "both," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That such operations, practices, and transactions at, on, or in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or other similar institution or place of business as are not prohibited by the regulations made by the President, pursuant to the provisions of this section, shall not be deemed to be within the intent and meaning of section 6 of this act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, let me state again that Judge Lindsey thought that section 6 and section 10, standing alone, would stop legitimate purchases and sales on boards of trade, transactions which, under ordinary circumstances, would not be prohibited, and thus might destroy markets for wheat. There has been some complaint here on the floor of the Senate that if we abolish them all overnight there would probably be a destruction of the wheat market.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Just a moment, if the Senator please. For the purpose of permitting those who are engaged in perfectly legitimate transactions to proceed, this amendment was proposed. Of course, if the Senate wants to put them all out of business, that is one thing; but if the Senate wants to leave the President the power to make regulations which would permit legitimate institutions to do business, and exclude those which were engaged in purely a speculative business, then this amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I may be mistaken, but, as I understand, there is no inhibition in regard to boards of trade under section 10, unless the President by rule or regulation or order interferes with their method of doing business. Is not that true?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is true; but section 6 should be taken in connection with section 10.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. What I do not quite understand about this amendment is that section 10 provides, in effect, that certain practices on boards of trade prohibited by rule or order or regulation of the President shall be illegal. The proviso proposed to be added is almost in substance a repetition, it seems to me, because it says that those things which the President does not prohibit shall not be illegal. The question I want to ask is, What effect would it have, anyway, if it were adopted? I doubt whether it would have any effect.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am frank to say that the insistence of Judge Lindsey seemed to me to be a distinction without a difference. I have never been able to make up my mind positively that it was necessary, and yet he was so insistent that if we did not put in this saving clause, this amendment, there would be ambiguity which might make the bill difficult of construction, the committee concluded to put it in.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that I see any objection to the amendment; but it seems to me, really, that it does not change the effect of section 10 whether we leave it in or whether we leave it out. Section 10 says that certain things the President shall prohibit shall be illegal and provides punishment for those who violate the President's order. This amendment provides that those practices which he does not prohibit shall not be illegal. I think that would follow in any event. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if that would not be true?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, my attention was diverted for the moment, and I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I was saying that I did not understand, from listening to the reading of this amendment, that it would really have any effect. Section 10, in substance, provides that the President shall have the power to cause practices and regulations of boards of trade to cease; he can provide by order that they shall cease; and if they do not, then those who violate the order become liable to the penalty provided in the act. This amendment simply says that those things which the President does not condemn in his order shall not be illegal. Would not that be true any way, whether we had this amendment or not?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that it is necessary to take into consideration subdivision (a) in section 6, which prohibits certain contracts.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. GORE. The amendment is designed to permit certain contracts that are not permitted to be made on boards of trade, which otherwise would be prohibited under subdivision (a) of section 6.

Mr. NORRIS. Subdivision (a) in section 6 is stricken out, as I understand.

Mr. GORE. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Subdivision (b) became subdivision (a).

Mr. GORE. But afterwards the amendment was reconsidered, and subdivision (a) was reinserted.

Mr. NORRIS. There is a subdivision (a) in the bill, but under an amendment agreed to, as I remember, what is now subdivision (a) in the bill was formerly subdivision (b).

Mr. GORE. Is that the subdivision that prohibits certain contracts?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that is subdivision (b) now.

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is subdivision (a) now.

Mr. GORE. I thought it was subdivision (a).

Mr. NORRIS. It reads as follows:

(a) Held, contracted for, or arranged for by any manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, or other dealer in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for use or sale by him for a reasonable time, or reasonably required to furnish necessaries produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The proposed amendment, as the Senator will notice, is to protect legitimate contracts and to remove them from the danger of ambiguity.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, the amendment really means in effect that hoarding, as defined in section 6, shall not be held to be hoarding unless the President says so.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator asked me a question a moment ago. According to my interpretation of the amendment, it applies to section 6 as well as to section 10——

Mr. NORRIS. I see that it does.

Mr. GRONNA. And provides that transactions on boards of trade shall not come within the meaning of the first provision of section 6, which reads:

The necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded within the meaning of this act—

And so on.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. The way I interpret that is, for instance, if wheat is bought by any board of trade according to the rules and regulations of that board, then it is excepted from the provisions of section 6, but otherwise it is not.

Mr. NORRIS. When I first called attention to it I had not considered it in connection with section 6; but, considering it in connection with section 6, it seems to me that it would have this effect: In section 6 we have defined hoarding and made it a crime. Now, this amendment, if agreed to, would have the effect of nullifying section 6, unless the President has said that the acts are illegal.

Mr. GRONNA. It would have the effect, if the Senator will pardon me, of excepting transactions made on boards of trade, but no others.

Mr. NORRIS. And they would all be excepted unless the President had ordered that they should not be.

Mr. GRONNA. That is my interpretation.

Mr. NORRIS. I am rather inclined to think that the Senator is right. The amendment has not been printed in the form of an amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. NORRIS. Senators have not had an opportunity to examine it. This is a very important amendment; and, since we are not going to conclude the bill anyway to-night, I think that it ought to go over and be printed, as other amendments are printed, so that we may be able to examine it and gather the full effect of it. I ask, Mr. President, that the amendment be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not hear the request of the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the amendment go over until to-morrow and that it be printed in the form of an amendment and laid on the desks of Senators.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that, Mr. President, and ask that it be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not know whether there are any other Senators who desire to address the Senate this afternoon. No one has indicated a desire to do so. I believe the Senator from Missouri would prefer to address the Senate to-morrow; and, if there is no objection to that course, I shall move that the Senate take a recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow. The Chair will inquire at what hour?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we ought to have an executive session.

Mr. REED. One moment. I do not intend to address the Senate upon this proposition. I think we can act upon the amendment to-night if the Senator will withdraw the second committee amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was just suggesting to the Senator to let it go over until to-morrow, and the Senator can address the Senate if he desires to do so at that time.

Mr. NORRIS Mr. President, since all the amendments of the committee have been acted upon except these two, I wish the Senator from Oregon would ask for a reprint of the bill with the amendments that have been adopted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I make the request that the bill be reprinted as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., Wednesday, July 11, 1917) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 12, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 11, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit our Heavenly Father, for the genius of our Republic which contemplates for each and every citizen the right to think his own thoughts, to worship Thee according to the dictates of his own conscience, and to enjoy the fruits of his own industry. Help us to cherish and hold these rights sacred to our hearts, and with patriotic zeal and fervor to guard them against all intruders. Above all, help us to use them in the spirit of the Master who taught us to do unto others as we would be done by. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate concurrent resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Senate concurrent resolution 7.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress have heard with profound satisfaction the assurance of Special Ambassador Bakhmetieff of the devotion of the Russian people and their constituted representatives to their new-found liberties and of their determination to defend and maintain these liberties and institutions.

Resolved further, That it is the earnest hope of the Congress that democracy and self-government may bring to the people of Russia that large measure of prosperity, progress, and freedom which they have brought to the people of America, and that Russia may be entirely successful in her concerted efforts to secure the unequaled blessings of an honorable and enduring peace.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I will have to object; this day is sacred——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and also the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], if the order that was made here the other day does not cut out Calendar Wednesday to-day?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it does.

Mr. STAFFORD. That depends upon whether the special order be a continuing order.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, if the Speaker wants to make that ruling he can do so, but I do not think it does.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined into that. Of course, the Chair is as anxious to preserve the rights under Calendar Wednesday as anybody, but it looks to the Chair as if a fair construction of that order cuts out to-day. The order reads as follows:

On motion of Mr. KITCHIN, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That on Monday, July 9, 1917, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, it shall be in order to proceed with the consideration of the bill

H. R. 4960, to punish trading with the enemy, and that such order shall be continuing until the bill is disposed of, consideration of conference reports, revenue and appropriation bills excepted.

It seems to the Chair it cuts out to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. Then it would cut out conference reports?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; they are excepted. The Chair is always particular to include conference reports, appropriation bills, and revenue bills.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, if that is the order, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 248 Members, a quorum, answered to their names.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The Chair lays before the House the following personal request.

The Clerk read as follows:

JULY 10, 1917.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I desire to ask leave of absence for nine days, beginning to-day, on account of official business. I leave this afternoon to join the other members of the Naval Affairs Committee in Boston, and it is our purpose to be away until July 18 investigating the navy yards of the Atlantic coast.

Thanking you, I am,
Yours, very sincerely, W. W. VENABLE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a couple of communications about the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing communications about the revenue bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4960.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4960, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4960, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4960) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee arose on yesterday there was under consideration an amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS]. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 32, lines 3 and 4, after the word "trustee," strike out the words "appointed prior to the beginning of the war and."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ROGERS. I understood the amendment was satisfactory to the gentleman from Virginia, and, if so, I do not care to take any time on it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I just wanted it to go over.

Mr. ROGERS. I conferred with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], and I understood it was satisfactory to him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] withholds the application of the provision relating to payments to the agent or trustee, whether or not that agent was appointed prior to the oubreak of the war.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the exception to the appointment of agencies of this character, as held by the decisions of the Supreme Court, some of which I have heretofore read, is in allowing payment of debts to the agent of an alien enemy where such agent resides in the same State with the debtor. Now, that is American law, but in every case which I have examined the agent was appointed prior to the outbreak of the war. International law prevents the appointment of an agent by the enemy in our territory. It interrupts all intercourse; all trade. There are very grave reasons why this principle of law should not obtain.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read several text writers on international law, and they invariably use the phrase "commercial intercourse," and there are writers who say that private communications are not forbidden during the pendency of war.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will say to the gentleman that he evidently has not in mind the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am questioning the gentleman's statement that all intercourse is absolutely forbidden by international law. So far as I have read the text-writers they only refer to the interception of commercial intercourse.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is all that this bill deals with.

Mr. STAFFORD. Further than that, by all means. You prevent the transfer of any property whatsoever, the rents from any property, whether it is the result of commercial intercourse or not, and prevent the payment to the duly accredited agent of the creditor domiciled in this country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I desire to call the attention of the committee to only one principle, which is vital, that after the outbreak of a war the citizen of one belligerent has no authority to appoint an agent in the territory of another belligerent to handle his property, to hold his property, to attend to his business. If so, we establish a basis of credit in our country by which the enemy creditor will derive immense benefits. Should we thereby enlarge and augment the commercial resources of the enemy? This is the fixed principle, as I understand it, of international jurisprudence. No power of attorney can be made after the war has opened. So all of the agents, found in the decisions examined by me, falling within the exception to which I have alluded are agents that were appointed prior to the outbreak of war. And therefore the section in question was drawn with that view in mind, of preserving the law as declared by the decisions of our own courts in relation to this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not care for any more time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman as to what his view is as to what is accomplished by subdivision section (b)? That would not exist in the absence of this subdivision.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So far as the agent is concerned, to which I am addressing myself, this amendment permits you to appoint an agent after the outbreak of the war, whereas the bill requires the agent to have been appointed before the outbreak of the war, and the appointment of an agent prior to the outbreak of the war complies with international law as interpreted by our courts.

Mr. LENROOT. The question I wanted to ask is: Does the language as reported from the committee in any sense or degree modify or change existing international law? In other words, if the section was stricken out would not the situation then be exactly as the gentleman now contends it should be?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not prepared to answer that question affirmatively, but it is safe to say that there are perhaps several portions of this bill that if stricken out the subject matter to which they relate would be taken care of by international law. But the purpose of the bill, as I have heretofore accentuated, is to define more concretely international law.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, was it not the general purpose of this bill, as stated by the gentleman, to rather mitigate the harshness of existing international law, and so far as that was not done, international law still applied in all of its parts?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think as a general statement the gentleman's position is correct, but I do not think that that position touches the particular amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. As has just been stated, in so far as enemies are concerned, that are recognized as such under international law, the language of this subsection does nothing more than declare what existing international law is. But as the bill now stands, and even as it will stand as amended—if section 2 is amended, as I hope it will be when we return to it later on—even then the word "enemy" will have a much wider definition than is now recognized by existing international law; and as the bill now stands it would prohibit and make unlawful this kind of a transaction: Suppose a cargo of coffee has been shipped to this country from Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, and the merchant that shipped it has an agent—not an established house of business, but an agent—in Germany, and transacts some business, if he can get coffee into Germany, and sells such coffee in Germany as he may be able to get through. A cargo of coffee is shipped into this country prior to the beginning of the war. A draft is drawn on the consignee or purchaser of the coffee, through the National City Bank of New York, we will say, for the payment of that cargo of coffee. Under this bill the merchant in Rio Janeiro, Brazil, is an enemy of this country; will be an enemy even if the amendment that I have suggested to the gentleman from Virginia shall be adopted. If, then, the purchaser of that coffee pays that draft to the National City Bank in New York, under the bill as it now stands the payment is unlawful. The man has not paid his debt at all, and the merchant in Rio de Janeiro can not recover the money from the National City Bank of New York that has been paid for that cargo of coffee.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that in this bill this House desires to go to any such extent, and it seems to me that this subdivision (b) of section 7 ought not to remain in the bill at all. We ought not, certainly so far as transactions are concerned prior to the passage of this act——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; when I have finished this sentence. We ought not to put a ban on all commercial transactions and say that they are void in every instance. The merchant in South America may happen to have an agent in Germany, which he has a perfect right to have under international law, and under international law we have no right to treat that merchant in South America as an enemy in this country, so far as business not relating to Germany is concerned, but only as to business between that country and our own.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I state to the gentleman that I partially concur in his views as respects subdivision (b) on page 31? That was not in the original bill as reported and considered by the committee. It was subsequently put in after elaborate hearings accorded to an association of importers in order to ameliorate the trade relations and to give benefits to those who do business of the character described by the gentleman, which they could not do without the authority contained in the proviso.

Mr. LENROOT. That was the proviso?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I have read the hearings; and, of course, without the proviso everything would have been void, and, of course, this ameliorates the condition to some extent. But, as I have read the hearings very carefully from beginning to end, it seems to have escaped every person who appeared before the committee—the wide and broad definition of the word "enemy"—and it never seems to have been discussed before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce as to whether or not that definition of the word "enemy" was not so sweeping as not only to be in violation of international law but as to prevent all commerce with all neutrals wherever any business was done by a neutral with an enemy of ours.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. While I am on my feet discussing this subdivision (b) I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia as to what his construction of this section is on the language, "If any property, money, or other property so held or so owned shall have been after the beginning of the war conveyed," and so forth. Is it the gentleman's construction that this provision relates only to transactions occurring after the beginning of the war and prior to the passage of this act, or is it his construction that it relates to transactions not only prior to the passage of the act and the beginning of the war but to all future transactions?

Mr. MONTAGUE. My construction is that the provision relates from the outbreak of the war and continues as long as the war lasts.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Then, I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact: That under that construction that he now gives it there is no exception in the language, "all payments to all enemies are made absolutely void." There is no exception, although the person might be licensed to trade with the enemy, and that license includes the making of payments. Nevertheless under this subdivision payments would be absolutely void, although he held a license to trade.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, addressing myself particularly to the point now at issue, and having reference only to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which is to strike out, on page 32, in line 3, after the word "trustee," the following words, "appointed prior to the beginning of the war," we have this situation confronting us: International law recognizes and has established that payments can be made and considered to be valid acquittances in law to an agent who is duly authorized, and with whom his principal is still consulting, and which principal recognizes the agent. But the Supremen Court of the United States, in Insurance Co. against Davis, clearly foreshadows and states that this agency must have been established prior to the declaration of war. In confirmance of that, permit me to refer the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] to page 431 of Ninety-fifth United States, in which this is said:

> But though a power of attorney to collect debts, given under such circumstances, might be valid, it is generally conceded that a power of attorney can not be given during the existence of war by a citizen of one of the belligerent countries resident therein to a citizen or resident of the other, for that would be holding intercourse with the enemy, which is forbidden.

Further on it is said as follows:

> Perhaps it may be assumed that an agent ante bellum, who continues to act as such during the war, in the receipt of money or property on behalf of his principal, where it is the manifest interest of the latter that he should do so, as in the collection of rents and other debts, the assent of the principal will be presumed unless the contrary be shown; but that, where it is against his interest, or would impose upon him some new obligation or burden, his assent will not be presumed, but must be proved, either by his subsequent ratification or in some other manner.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. One moment, after I have finished this citation. On page 429 of the same opinion we find this:

As war suspends all intercourse between them, preventing any instructions, supervision, or knowledge of what takes place, on the one part, and any report or application for advice on the other, this relation necessarily ceases on the breaking out of hostilities, even for the limited purpose before mentioned——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman read the following clause?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. "Unless continued by the mutual assent of the parties."

Mr. DEWALT. Exactly—

unless continued by the mutual assent of the parties.

But all through this decision the Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice Harlan, said that the agency must have been established ante bellum, and the reason for it is very clear in the mind of the justice, that immediately upon the breaking out of hostilities and the declaration of war all intercourse between the belligerents ipso facto ceases.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the gentleman's contention that the declaration of war in itself suspends all intercourse between neutrals who may be doing some business——

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, that is not the question which we are now discussing.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the question.

Mr. DEWALT. It is not pertinent to this inquiry. We are now discussing the question as to whether or not an agency can be established and maintained after the declaration of war. That is the question.

Mr. LENROOT. Can it not, by a neutral who may be doing business with the enemy? That is my question, and it is directly pertinent to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DEWALT. No; if he is dealing with the enemy and the enemy profit by such dealings, then of course he is the agent of the enemy.

Mr. LENROOT. Although the dealings he has with us have no relation to his dealings with the enemy?

Mr. DEWALT. Ah, I grant you that that would be the exception; yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but it is absolutely prohibited under the language of the bill as it now stands.

Mr. DEWALT. No; I am not talking about that provision of the bill. I am talking now about this amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent that the time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the gentleman this? He thinks that the inquiry does not relate to the gentleman's amendment. Supposing a neutral does business with an enemy as an agent appointed after the war, in this country, with relation to a business that has no connection with his business in Germany. Unless the gentleman's amendment is adopted, is not that transaction made absolutely void?

Mr. DEWALT. I can not follow the gentleman's conclusion at all.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I should like to read to the gentleman a sentence in the Davis opinion prior to that which he read, and which begins at the bottom of page 430:

What particular circumstances will be sufficient to show the consent of one person that another shall act as his agent to receive payment of debts in an enemy's country during war may sometimes be difficult to determine.

And the sentence which the gentleman read—

But though a power of attorney to collect debts given under such circumstances might be valid—

And so forth.

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, yes; a power of attorney to collect debts might be valid.

Mr. ROGERS. In other words, the Supreme Court certainly leaves open the question whether a power of attorney to collect debts created after war has begun is valid.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, indeed.

Mr. DEWALT. That would be true if the Supreme Court had not in the very same breath said in the succeeding line that—

A power of attorney can not be given during the existence of war by a citizen of one of the belligerent countries resident therein to a citizen or resident of the other.

Mr. ROGERS. But it specifically intimates that a power of attorney to collect debts may be valid. The question presented by my amendment relates to the legitimacy of payments of debt in this country. Now, will the gentleman consider this case: Supposing an agency is created by a German in Germany, the agent being a resident and citizen of the United States. That agency is created May 1. There was nothing hostile about that act. There is no commercial intercourse involved in that act. As a result of it a citizen of the United States pays the debt—which he owes to a German subject—to the agent in the United States.

It is conceded that if that agency had existed prior to the war and continued after war began it would have been a perfectly valid payment. Is there any difference in the nature of things between an agency established one day before the declaration of war and one established one day after the declaration of war? Does it help out the debtor citizen of the United States to tell him that if he had paid an agent appointed April 5 it would have been valid, but because he paid the agents appointed April 7 the payment is void, although made in perfectly good faith?

Mr. DEWALT. In response to that I will say that while it may not be fair to the individual to whom the gentleman has referred, it is fair and eminently just to the whole body of the people. Why? Because the initial idea in the whole act, the initial idea of international law, is immediately upon the declaration of war all intercourse shall cease between the belligerents. And further than that, granting that it is a hardship on the individual, nevertheless just as soon as you allow the establishment of these agencies subsequent to the declaration of war you are forming a basis of intercourse between the belligerents which the act prohibits and international law does not recognize. When you do that you are establishing a basis of credit for the enemy in this country by recognizing agencies established after the declaration of war. I can not make it any clearer than that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts relates only to the proviso, paragraph (b), section 7. The proviso only legitimatizes payments made before the passage of this act. It does not relate to future transactions. Now, what is the objection? Somebody has appointed an agent in this country in good faith, after the declaration of war and before the passage of this act, and money has been paid to that agent. What is the objection to permitting that payment to stand as valid?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will say to the gentleman that I have an amendment which I shall offer which perhaps may cover the point in the gentleman's mind. Will the gentleman permit me to read it?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE (reading)—

Page 32, line 8, after the word "war," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add:

"Provided further, That no person shall, by virtue of any assignment, indorsement, delivery, or transfer of any debt, obligation, or chose in action, made or to be made in his favor by or on behalf of an enemy or ally of an enemy, have any right or remedy against a debtor, obligor, consignor, indorser, or person delivering the same, unless he prove that the assignment, indorsement, delivery, or transfer was made under license as provided in this act, or was made before the beginning of the war."

Mr. MANN. I will not undertake to express an opinion upon that, because it has not yet soaked into my mind; but it has nothing to do with the question involved in this amendment. Here is the proposition: You propose to say by this proviso that if a payment is made by a citizen of the United States of a debt owing to a German citizen to the agent of the German citizen, not to be transmitted during the war, that that payment is valid provided the agent was appointed before the war commenced. What is the objection to extending that by saying provided the agent is appointed and payment is made before this act takes effect? We do not want to absolutely undertake to prevent all payments of indebtedness which our people may owe to German citizens. The world has changed much since these provisions of international law were called international law. Business transactions have changed throughout the world. It is better for us to keep good faith as far as possible. I can not see what objection there is if such payment has been made in good faith before the passage of the act to let it stand, even if it were for the benefit of the German citizen.

But take the case suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], where payment is made in good faith for a neutral country; what is the sense in saying that if payment was made before the passage of the act it is void? This does not extend to the future. The proviso does not legitimatize payments made in the future; it only refers to payments made before the passage of the act. As far as the enemy is concerned,

I am in favor of prosecuting the war with Germany. I am in favor of licking the German Government. There is nothing else for us to do. As far as commerce is concerned that has taken place in the past, I believe in keeping good faith, as gentlemen throughout the world endeavor to do.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I am as much in favor as the gentleman from Illinois of keeping good faith with Germany, and I recognize fully the rights existing at the outbreak of the war, but I am first in favor of protecting American rights and American trade, and I shall cast no vote here, if I know it, by which German credit shall be established or enhanced. [Applause.] I shall not vote to give the enemy a base of supplies in America through commercial agents, trustees, or otherwise, and I beg the committee not to insert this amendment by which we in a measure will emasculate our rights and impair our safety.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman makes a speech that is very good but has nothing to do with the subject.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. MANN. I am going to explain it, if the gentleman will permit me. This proviso proposes by itself to cut off what would be some of the rights of American citizens. It proposes to legitimatize certain payments made for indebtedness. Now, the gentleman says you go just so far and that is proper, but if you go a step further in good faith that is improper. I do not think that is good judgment. If these payments have been made in good faith before the passage of this act, the gentleman proposes to recognize a part of them, and I propose to recognize all of them made in good faith, the payments of course not to be transmitted to the enemy.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman say about payments that may be made from now until this becomes a law? If the gentleman's proviso is put in, you are inviting payments until the passage of this act.

Mr. MANN. Permitting them undoubtedly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that it is a rather serious matter.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not think there is anything serious about it at all. Why should not we permit payments? Payments in the main go to neutrals; they do not go to the German citizens. The neutrals are the ones who are specially interested.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman's position is right, why should we have any limitation of time? You have to have one at some point. The gentleman is urging that the time limitation shall be when the act takes effect, whereas the committee has been urging that the time limitation should be the appointment of an agency before the war.

Mr. MANN. Until the law is passed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why put it then? Why not let it go on continuously, if the gentleman does not think it is important?

Mr. MANN. I think it is important that payments made now which are permitted under the law to these neutrals should stand as valid payments.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman will permit, how long would the gentleman continue it?

Mr. MANN. Until the passage of the act.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When will this act likely be passed?

Mr. MANN. I hope that we shall pass it very soon.

Mr. SHERLEY. If payments are permitted now, the prohibition in this act will not make invalid a payment that was valid when made.

Mr. MANN. That is exactly what it does do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps the gentleman is right.

Mr. MANN. This is a proviso——

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is probably right.

Mr. MANN. It does make it invalid.

Mr. SHERLEY. I was thinking for a moment of an ex post facto law and not of a law impairing the validity of contracts.

Mr. MANN. This bill proposes that you can not make a payment to a neutral doing business in the United States who happens to have had or who has an agent in Germany, though that neutral may be doing a great amount of business with us. This prohibits those payments, makes them invalid, and the exception provides that if payments are made to an agent appointed before the war they shall be valid. I say that the exception should come down as far as the time when you make the payment itself invalid. By the section we make the payment invalid, but payments that have been made before they are made invalid ought to be treated as valid payments. To do otherwise is outraging all commercial sense of honor.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROGERS) there were—ayes 39, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I have a few committee amendments which are purely formal, which I desire to offer at this time. On page 30, line 12, after the words "United States," I move to amend by inserting a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 12, after the words "United States," insert a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. On the same page, line 15, after the word "President," strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 15, after the word "President," strike out the word "shall" and insert in lieu thereof the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agred to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. On page 31, line 6, after the word "shall," insert the word "have."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 6, after the word "shall," insert the word "have."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. On the same page, line 7, after the word "shall," insert the word "have."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 7, after the word "shall," insert the word "have."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. On page 32, line 14, after the word "enemy," insert a comma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 14, after the word "enemy," insert a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. On page 30, line 16, after the word "act," insert "and at such other times thereafter as the Secretary of Commerce may require."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONTAGUE: Page 30, line 16, after the word "act," insert the following: "and at such other times thereafter as the Secretary of Commerce may require."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, that amendment was suggested to me by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and I think it helps to clarify the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. What is the penalty if a corporation does not comply with paragraph (a) of section 7 with respect to giving a full list of officers, directors, and stockholders? Is there any penalty?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think there is a penalty, but to be frank I would say that I can not at this moment answer. If the gentleman will indulge me for an instant, I will read it.

Mr. ESCH. It is section 15.

Mr. MANN. What is the penalty?

Mr. ESCH. It is not more than $10,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not to exceed $10,000.

Mr. MANN. Is not this rather an onerous provision to put every corporation in the United States under a penalty of $10,000 to transmit these names?

Mr. ESCH. That is the maximum.

Mr. MANN. The names of every officer, director, or stockholder who is an enemy or ally of the enemy. Suppose they do not know; suppose they make a mistake?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, they would be fined a dollar, a nominal fine.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they could be perhaps fined a dollar; yes; but the penalty is $10,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is the maximum penalty.

Mr. MANN. The maximum penalty is the penalty which may be imposed. Here is a very short time—30 days' time. As to the United States Steel Co., I venture to say it would be a physical impossibility, a mental impossibility, for them to comply. Of course, a penalty of $10,000 against that corporation would not bother them any, but it is a mental and physical impossibility for them to comply with this provision in the bill.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. I call the attention of the gentleman to the last sentence in the paragraph, at the top of page 31, where it says:

> The Secretary of Commerce may extend the time for filing the list or report for a period of not exceeding 90 days from date of passage of this act.

Mr. MANN. That is a wise provision. I do not know whether he will do it or not. I do not see why we do not extend the time. We know it can not be complied with in 30 days, and to put a penalty if they make a mistake and not know the citizenship or residence of every one of their stockholders—why, no corporation in the United States does that.

Mr. ESCH. Does the gentleman wish to amend by making it six months? We have no objection.

Mr. MANN. I would make it 90 days in the bill, to begin with, and then give them leave to extend it for 90 days.

Mr. ESCH. Why, we leave the requirement for 30 days within which to file the list, and then we permit a further extension of 90 days. I realize that is a short time. There are in the Treasury Department something like 340,000 corporations listed under the corporation-tax provision. Now, there may be in those corporations thousands and possibly hundreds of thousands of people who would come under the definition of "enemy" under this act, and it may take a very large amount of time to list them.

I would be willing, as far as I am concerned, to extend the time.

Mr. MANN. Probably the department will wish to issue a form on which these returns are to be made, and if we can judge from experience the form will not be ready until the end of 29 days or perhaps 31 days.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MANN. I would make it at least 90 days.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It can be extended now.

Mr. MANN. I would make it 90 days in the beginning and then with leave to extend for 90 days. Where it says 30 days I would make it 90 days and then I would extend it for 90 days.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, as to many of these corporations in which there are foreign stockholders and bondholders the lists are already practically complete. That is true in reference to railroads and public utilities generally, and it would not take them but a very few days to make a list of their foreign stockholders and bondholders, but there are a great many other manufacturing institutions and other institutions where it might take considerable time to ascertain the ownership of the stock. In the markets of New York and Chicago a great deal of stock is listed as in care of some other individual. The officers of the corporation would have to make inquiries and I can realize that it would take time.

Mr. MANN. Of course where a corporation has listed the stockholders and has it arranged according to residence, it is easy to make up the list of the stockholders. That is a simple proposition, but the foreign stockholders may have an address in the United States, care of some one here.

Mr. ESCH. Yes, that is true.

Mr. MANN. And he might still be a German citizen or a Germany enemy or a banking house somewhere.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then the stockholders do not remain the same for any length of time; they are constantly changing, and those who are on the list one week may not be there the next week.

Mr. MANN. I do not know under what authority a German citizen can transfer stock to anyone in the United States or any other thing. An American citizen can not transfer stock to an alien enemy.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He might do it, although it might be illegal.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman. If the point I last raised is not of any particular value, I would like to suggest one other. The list of aliens under this act when it becomes a law is likely to change from time to time. A man who is an alien to-day may not be one next week, and a man who is an alien next week may not be an alien to-day. Why?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's amendment proposes to make this from time to time hereafter.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand that. For instance, if the President should exercise the authority vested in him under subsection (c), on page 24, he could make individuals who are in the United States and who are not citizens of the United States enemies by making appropriate proclamation, either if they are individuals or if they are members of a class or body.

Now, a man who is not an enemy to-day—a stockholder—naturally would not be listed as an enemy and his name sent in. The President may issue a proclamation making all members of a certain class enemies next week, whereupon this list as provided for here would not be correct in any sense of the term. Of course, the Secretary might require from time to time additional lists, but there is nothing here that instructs him to do it. He has authority to do it.

Mr. ESCH. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] would cover that point.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggested 90 days, as I understood it.

Mr. ESCH. I suggest 60 days in the first period.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I accept that, if I may be permitted to do so.

Mr. MANN. After the gentleman's amendment is disposed of.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] pardon me for one moment?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I wanted to make another inquiry in regard to subsection (c).

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment shall conclude in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment shall conclude in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that amendment read, if there is no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the Clerk again reporting the amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] that all debate upon the pending amendment close in five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Has not that amendment been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] is recognized.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that here again, as in many other places, we run into a difficulty arising out of the breadth of definition of the word "enemy," on page 23, line 23, and following. A good deal has been said about the effect of war in breaking off commercial intercourse with the enemy. This effect of the outbreak of war is recognized in international law—not required by it. It should not be overlooked that this interruption has to do only with commerce with the enemy, as the word "enemy" is ordinarily defined in international law. This bill makes a particular definition of the word for the purposes of this act, which is quite different. I shall quote it presently.

Now, if we require the officers of every corporation to make within 30 days a list of all enemies who own stock in the company, that will include every variety of enemy included in the definition beginning on page 23, any resident of Argentina or of Peru, whatever his nationality, provided only that in carrying on his business he has a branch house in Germany or employs an agent in that country.

It will be absolutely impossible for the officers of the corporation to run down all these facts in 30 or in 90 days. In the case of a corporation which has a great many thousand stockholders, the stockholders may be listed according to address, but the officers of the corporation do not have a history of each man's life, with information covering all his business relationships, and they may be violating the law without having any possibility of knowing they are violating the law. If the enemy spoken of here were an enemy in the sense ordinarily given to that word by writers on international law, the difficulty would not be so great, but the term "enemy" as defined in this act covers anybody resident anywhere that is doing business in any way within the limits of a country with which we are at war. Now, it seems to me that the paragraph, taking that fact into consideration, requires impossibilities.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman allude now to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] or to the amendment I have offered?

Mr. TEMPLE. To both—to the requirement of the paragraph as it stands and the amendment, that such a list shall be furnished within 30 days and at such times thereafter as the Secretary of Commerce may require.

My point is that the officers of the company, so far as I know, have no means of finding out these facts about all their stockholders.

Suppose I am a stockholder and sell to somebody, and the stock is to be transferred on the books of the company, must I furnish or must the company acquire in some way information about the new purchaser, a knowledge of all his business relations all over the world, in order to be sure that he does not employ an agent doing business in Germany?

Here is the definition of "enemy":

That the word "enemy" as used herein shall be deemed to mean:
(a) Any individual, partnership, or other body of individuals, of any nationality, resident within the territory (including that occupied by the military and naval forces) of any nation with which the United States is at war, or resident outside of the United States, and doing business within such territory, and any corporation incorporated within such territory—

And so forth.

Subsection (c) further enlarges the definition of "enemy" as follows:

Such other individuals, or body of individuals, as may be citizens or subjects of any nation with which the United States is at war, wherever resident or wherever doing business, as the President, if he shall find the safety of the United States or the successful prosecution of the war shall so require, may, by proclamation, include within the term "enemy."

Even resident within the United States.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Would the gentleman's inquiry be covered by striking out the words "who is," in line 18, page 30, and inserting the words "known to be," or some similar words?

Mr. TEMPLE. That would evade the difficulty. Whether it would accomplish the purpose of the section is another question. But it does seem to me that it is involving officers of every corporation in the country in a serious difficulty to require them to furnish facts about the business relationship of their stockholders, when there is no way by which they can require the stockholders to furnish the desired information.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to say that at the proper time I shall offer an amendment confining the scope of this section to enemies resident within enemy territory and citizens or subjects of the nation with which we are at war.

Mr. TEMPLE. That would meet the situation, it seems to me, precisely, because the difficulty lies in the broad definition of the word "enemy," found in section 2 of this bill, which I have quoted above.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now, will the gentleman indulge me just a moment? I will then be through with the so-called committee amendments.

Mr. MANN. There is an amendment about 30 or 90 days. Is the gentleman going to offer that?

Mr. DEWALT. This is a committee amendment prior to that, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, page 30, line 16, by striking out the word "thirty" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Amend, page 30, line 16, by striking out the word "thirty" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixty."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The committee has no objection to that, so far as I have been able to confer with the members.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood it was the desire to grant to the Secretary of Commerce the right to extend to file reports 90 days beyond that.

Mr. MANN. That is the purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under that authorization he would be allowed to extend the time only 90 days after the passage of this act, whereas I understood it was the consensus of opinion that the Secretary of Commerce should have the power to extend the time 90 days beyond the expiration of the 60-day period.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to strike out "from the date of the passage of this act," so that it would give the Secretary authority to extend the time 90 days beyond the 60 days, which may be essential in some cases. I will offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 31, line 12, the balance of the paragraph after the word "days."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 31, line 12, strike out all the paragraph after the word "days."

Mr. MANN. That would simply permit the Secretary to extend the time, and might meet such an emergency as arose a few years ago with reference to the income tax on a lot of corporations that did not make a report within the time required because they thought they were not required to make reports, and they were penalized all over the country.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I suggest that there be put in, in front of the word "period," the words "for an additional period not exceeding ninety days," because now the 90 days might be construed to include the original 60. That would make it perfectly plain.

Mr. MANN. All right. I will offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move, on page 31, line 12, to strike out the word "a" and insert in lieu thereof the words "an additional."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: On page 31, line 12, strike out the word "a" and insert in lieu thereof the words "an additional."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 32, line 8, after the word "war," strike out the period, insert a colon and add:
"Provided further, That no person shall, by virtue of any assignment, indorsement, delivery, or transfer of any debt, obligation, or chose in action, made or to be made in his favor by or on behalf of an enemy or ally of enemy, have any right or remedy against a debtor, obligor, consignor, indorser, or person delivering the same, unless he prove that the assignment, indorsement, delivery, or transfer was made under license, as provided in this act, or was made before the beginning of the war."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion as to that, possibly as to the form? It says, "unless he prove." Why not simply say "unless license was issued"?

Mr. DEWALT. That is all right.

Mr. MANN. I do not know where he would prove it. I do not know just what language would come out.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no objection. I will accept that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the chairman of the committee whether this amendment contemplates those instances where the money has been paid over in good faith following the declaration of war to an agent that has heretofore been appointed prior to the war to receive these funds?

Mr. DEWALT. It does not apply to those instances, for the reason that——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, the language that I would strike out of the amendment reported by the gentleman would do this. He proves that the assignment, indorsement, delivery, or transfer, was made so that it would read, "remedy against a debtor, obligor, consignor, indorser, or person delivering the same was licensed as provided in this act."

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is as I understood the gentleman.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I see you use the words "beginning of the war." Why not use the technical term "declaration of war"?

Mr. MONTAGUE. We used the words as defined in the act.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia ask to modify his amendment or withdraw it and offer another?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask leave to modify it as indicated by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks leave to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment as it will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment: Page 32, line 8, after the word "war," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add:

"Provided further, That no person shall by virtue of any assignment, indorsement, delivery, or transfer of any debt, obligation, or chose in action, made or to be made in his favor by or on behalf of an enemy or ally of enemy, have any right or remedy against the debtor, obligor, assignor, indorser, or the person delivering the same, unless under license as provided in this act, or was made before the beginning of the war."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment again raises this very troublesome question of the status of transactions occuring prior to the passage of this act and after the beginning of the war. If this amendment is adopted in its present form, and an assignment has been made by a neutral in good faith to an American citizen upon a purely business transaction between that citizen and this country, if that neutral happens to have an agent residing in Germany, all his rights are cut off. Not only that, but the American citizen may have paid to that neutral the full extent of the obligation, secured an assignment of it, which he had a right to do under international law, and yet if this amendment is adopted that American citizen, holding that obligation by indorsement or assignment, is prohibited from suing the debtor.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin permit me?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. From the gentleman's standpoint that conclusion obtains. I do not concede it. But if the amendment which the gentleman offered relating to the definition of "enemy" should be carried, then the objection made to this amendment would not obtain.

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Therefore I suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. LENROOT. I hope the gentleman will accept the amendment which I have offered. I think the gentleman is correct. that if that amendment should be adopted it would take care of this.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In other words, the definition of "enemy" will or will not control the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; but unless that amendment is adopted the bill as it now stands would render absolutely void innocent transactions carried on in the utmost good faith, and undoubtedly would deprive many American citizens of property rights that they would enjoy under international law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 30, line 19, after the word enemy," insert "Resident within the territory, or a subject or citizen of any nation with which the United States is at war, or resident within the territory or a subject or citizen of any ally of any nation with which the United States is at war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, may we have that amendment read again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would not the scope of the gentleman's amendment apply to alien citizens of Germany living in this country? As I gleaned the effect of the amendment, it would apply to citizens of Germany domiciled in this country.

Mr. LENROOT. It would. I ask leave to modify it by inserting after the word "citizen" the words "residing outside of the United States."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin permit me?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the gentleman think that the definition of an enemy, as embraced in the present amendment, had better be considered in relation to section 2, where the enemy is defined? Does he not think that if we attach it at this point of the bill it will have a tendency to dislocate or disarrange the whole bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to why the situation is different with reference to this paragraph than with reference to the one we last considered. In the one we last considered the word "enemy" would be applied, I concede, to the business done; but in this paragraph a neutral would be occupying a dual position—an enemy with respect to any business that he did with Germany, but not an enemy otherwise. This would require the inclusion within this list of stockholders of any neutral doing business in Germany; so that it is different than in the case that we last considered; and as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] so well stated, it would be imposing an impossible task upon the corporations of this country, where they have neutral stockholders all over the world, to ascertain as to whether or not they are doing business with Germany and thus come within the inclusion of the term "enemy" as is provided in this section. It seems to me everything is accomplished, so far as the safety of the United States is concerned, if we require the corporation to include every officer and stockholder resident in Germany and every enemy citizen or subject of Germany, wherever resident outside of the United States. It seems to me we then cover all possible cases of real enemy character.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the purpose of this provision is to get a list of stockholders, so that the Government may require the dividends on the stock to be paid to the custodian, in order to help us carry on the war. Now, does the gentleman think it is even desirable that the Government of the United States should undertake to say that dividends due to Germans living in Brazil shall be commandeered in the United States for the purpose of carrying on the war against Germany?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course this section does not commandeer any dividends.

Mr. MANN. No; but this section undertakes to get a list, and the list is for the purpose of commandeering dividends. Why should not the list be a list of those where it is proper for us to take the money due to them for temporary use in order to lick Germany?

Mr. LENROOT. In reply to the gentleman, I frankly say that everything will be accomplished if we limit it to those residing in Germany, but I included the others in the hope that it might help to pass the amendment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Suppose we take the instance that the gentleman suggests, that a German citizen resident in the Argentine Republic and that his business is that of buying coal and transporting it to Germany, and that he is also a large stockholder in an American corporation. Does not the gentleman think that he should be reached in some way?

Mr. LENROOT. My amendment covers him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The point I make again is that we had better stick to the section devoted to definitions, and not make definitions from place to place throughout the bill, otherwise endless confusion may result.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my good friend from Virginia has suggested that if a corporation in the United States owes a dividend to a German in Argentina, we ought to take that away and put it in the Treasury of the United States to carry on the war against Germany.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If he is doing business in Germany.

Mr. MANN. He is in business in the Argentine Republic.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not the case I instanced.

Mr. MANN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin would cover the case of the gentleman in Argentina that I have referred to, and so would the original bill. You are endeavoring to gain the sympathy and aid of the South American Republic in the war, and in the end it will be a great advantage for us to have it. Does the gentleman think that he will gain the sympathy and the aid of the South American Republics by undertaking to take away arbitrarily money due to them by the people of the United States?

What would we have thought if Great Britain had said to the United States—and the Lord knows that she went arbitrarily as far as she could—if she had said that it would be an illegal act for corporations to pay money in the United States to a German? We have got to be fair about these things if we want to gain the sympathy of the world, and it is very important that we should gain it. I do not think we gain anything by undertaking to commandeer dividends due from corporations in the United States belonging to German subjects or citizens who may have left home many years ago living in South America and other countries and not involved in any way in the war.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that we can not commandeer dividends, and I do not think we can successfully. In the first place, you can not compel a corporation to pay dividends, and it is so easy to avoid some of the provisions of this bill. We can do ourselves a great deal of harm by being too severe and attempting to cover too much.

Less than a year ago a Member of this House, to my knowledge, for I believe what he said, was prevented by Great Britain from selling to his agent in the Argentine Republic several thousand dollars worth of products of his establishment because Great Britain had blacklisted the man, who was a German and who had been doing business in the Argentine Republic for 40 years. The business was supplying of machinery for farms. It had no more to do with Germany than it had with the kingdom of heaven, but because he was a German Great Britain blacklisted him in the Argentine Republic. We are going way beyond that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He must be doing business within Germany, otherwise he is not embraced.

Mr. HILL. I understand under the terms of this bill, although I may be mistaken, that if he is an alien citizen he can be listed by the President in a class—every citizen of Germany anywhere in the wide, wide world, under the terms of this bill, as I understand, can be listed as an alien enemy, and he then becomes subject to the provisions of this bill. The provisions of this section are utterly impossible of being carried out, and I do not want to see them carried out for another reason. This war is not going to last forever. The end of the world has not come. We are going to do business in the future. We have an enormous country. It is a good deal like undertaking to control the food supply.

Mr. Hoover could do it in a little country like Belgium or a portion of it not much larger than the State of Connecticut, where he only had to control it for a small population, but in my judgment it is impossible to control it by legislation in a country 3,000 miles long and 2,500 miles wide, with more than a hundred million people, unless he can repeal the somewhat long-standing law of supply and demand. While the Senate is debating the food-supply bill the Almighty is controlling the food supply of this country.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Does the gentleman say that a German citizen in Brazil would have his business controlled by this bill?

Mr. HILL. I mean to say that this bill would prevent any railroad in this country paying him a dividend on stock he owned in that railroad. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not so understand it?

Mr. MANN. I will say yes, but I did not hear the question. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Of course the gentleman would say yes. I would like to have it disputed if it is true. Is that what we are trying to do, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HILL. Well, I hope the gentleman will be some day.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the question?

Mr. HILL. Is a citizen of the United States forbidden to do business with an alien enemy wherever he may be in this wide, wide world if the President classes all German residents anywhere in the world as alien enemies, as the bill authorizes him to do?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think so. The President has a right so to class him providing he does business within Germany no matter where he resides. His business is helping to augment the resources of Germany, and we ought not to permit him to draw supplies and moneys and credits from the United States for any such purpose.

Mr. HILL. If we do not know what the bill means and the committee does not know what the bill means, it seems to me that they ought to withdraw it and give it more thorough discussion, and come back prepared to say what it does mean.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman from Virginia is incorrect wherein he states that the President has a right by proclamation to prevent United States citizens from doing business with any alien, wherever resident, provided that alien does business with Germany.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not say that he has a right to prevent his doing business.

Mr. HILL. He can not do business without entering into a financial transaction.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This bill classes a man who does business within Germany as an enemy of America. He is, quoad that business, a resident of Germany.

Mr. LENROOT. If the President so proclaims, a German citizen, a resident of the Argentine Republic, having no business relations with Germany, still comes within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I want to go a little bit further. I want to look out for the future, after the war is over. We can not live for ourselves for the rest of time. We have to consider conditions after the war is over. I think we are duplicating tremendously annoying propositions here that will come back to plague us after the war is over. If I have a correct recollection of the facts, at the second Hague conference the nations of the world agreed that private property in time of war should not be subject to confiscation. An attempt was made to have that so with private property on sea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. The conference asked that the same thing might be done with regard to private property on sea, and Great Britain, with the largest navy in the world, refused to permit it. It was done in regard to private property on land. Now, we say that we will do what we choose under the stress of war. The nations have agreed that under the stress of war private property in the hands of an individual owner shall be sacred on land. I do not care whether Great Britain has violated it or not. Because she has violated it she has no right to ask us to do the same. The gentleman says that she has not. I say that we are following in her footsteps under entirely different conditions, 3,000 miles removed from the scene of the conflict.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. I want to know if this is a war measure; whether it will continue after the war. The gentleman seems to think it will go on after the war is over.

Mr. HILL. It will depend entirely upon the Paris conference and the agreement of the allies after the war, and we are bound by it morally, whether we are actually or not. I do not want to see this Nation enter into an economic war after the war is over.

Mr. QUIN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. We are laying the foundation for just that sort of thing in bills of this character.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Virginia admitted yesterday that this was permanent legislation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he does not quote me correctly. I admitted, so far as that particular paragraph was concerned, that it would meet similar conditions hereafter arising, but it is apparent that the bulk of this act ipso facto dissolves when the war ends.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I took the gentleman at his word yesterday, that the bill provided for such future wars. That was the very question raised. I took the word of the gentleman as a lawyer, and understood from his statement that this was to be permanent legislation to meet the future as well as the present emergency.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Either the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was very unfortunate in expression or in understanding.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, it is already admitted, both upon the part of the committee and on the part of other Members of the House that the real scope of this bill is not clear. I want to say to you that its scope and extent is not understood or comprehended. No man thought two years ago that the United States would be sending, as the President says we may possibly do now, millions of its citizens, the best blood of America, to fight in the battle fields of Europe. You can not tell where this thing is going. To-day there is far more likelihood of covering other nations than those now engaged in the war under the provisions of this bill than I think the committee ever realized or expected. I say that we ought not to duplicate these things.

We ought not to provide that three or four different departments of the Government shall be doing the same class of work at duplicated expense, although that is small account compared to other features of the bill. We are now beyond the point where in many respects the bureaucracy of Russia does not compare with what we have here now, and ours is being increased and extended to an infinite extent. Let me tell you a circumstance that occurred the other day. A resident of Connecticut, the president of one of our manufacturing corporations, residing for years in this country, having recently applied for naturalization papers, never dreaming it was necessary, the selling man of that concern, sent to me, through his attorney in New York, and applied for a permit and a license from the Attorney General's Office to travel in his usual accustomed way in the country. He got the license and permit to go from New York, his business office, to his factory in Connecticut. He had to get a license in this free country of ours—just as loyal a man and resident as you or I—and he asked me, "Can not I travel in the United States without going to every district for a license?" He is limited to 50 miles, as I recall, and that is the only portion of the United States he can go in without being subject to arrest. I went to the Attorney General's Office for the permit to transact his business, a straightforward, legitimate business. If I am not mistaken, he was requested to come here years and years ago from Germany to do business here, and he was refused by the Attorney General's Office, and he is now shut down to within 50 miles of his residence and his factory, and he has got to have somebody else to sell his goods; and we are now saying that he shall take the list of stockholders of his concern and report them to the custodian, and that the money from dividends on the property shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, to be treated in some way when the war is over, when nobody knows what conditions will arise and when nobody dreams what the conditions may be; when nobody realizes the enmities that may possibly have been incurred between now and then. He is shut down to a 50-mile area of freedom in this free country of ours. Why, a convict, a criminal—and I have talked with them—in Siberia can go 250 miles from home without a passport, and my loyal friend can not go any more than 50 miles from his home here. He has got to go into every district in the United States and apply for a permit to travel to save being arrested because he may be within half a mile of a navy yard or some public building, or something of that kind. Where are we going in bureaucratic legislative power?

Mr. QUIN. If the gentleman will permit, would there be any way for a good loyal man like that to be exempted from this——

Mr. HILL. Yes; he can go into every marshal's district in the United States and get a permit to travel in that district.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. I did not understand how long the gentleman had lived in this country?

Mr. HILL. Oh, I do not know.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Naturalized?

Mr. HILL. He came here years ago. He has applied for naturalization papers, as I am informed.

Mr. McKENZIE. Since the war began?

Mr. HILL. My impression is that he made application either immediately before or at once after the war began, but I am not sure about that. But we invited those people years ago to come to this country, the refuge of the oppressed and suffering of all nations, as we proudly called it, and now we turn around and say that they are made criminals, and we must apply criminal laws to them.

Mr. DEWALT. It might have been well for this citizen of whom the gentleman speaks to have applied for naturalization papers——

Mr. HILL. He has.

Mr. DEWALT. Just now. If he is a suspect, he ought to be confined.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman want to send him back home? We invited millions of them here. Do you want to send back the Danes and the Hollanders and the Swedes, and all foreigners? If you do, you would depopulate the whole country, and who knows to whom the provisions of this bill will apply before peace comes.

Mr. DEWALT. If they do not do anything against the country——

Mr. HILL. I want to be loyal to them, and I want them to be loyal to us.

Mr. DEWALT. If this gentleman had been so loyal of whom the gentleman speaks he would have taken out naturalization papers long ago.

Mr. HILL. What did the gentleman's father do when he came to this country?

Mr. DEWALT. He was born in this country and helped to make it.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman's question apply to all of us? I would send them back if they did not comply with the law, and I would not permit them to criticize us at this time.

Mr. HILL. I would not permit them to criticize us, but I would try to stop it first by making our law fair and just.

Mr. BUTLER. Not one.

Mr. HILL. I do not come here pleading for foreigners; I take no criticism of my patriotism here from anybody. My ancestors came to this country 270 years ago, and there has not been a war from colonial times down until now in which they have not participated. They have never been in any rebellion and have always stood by the Government. I do not take any lessons in patriotism from anybody, either the committee or anybody else. I want at least to try to treat these people fairly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman from Connecticut will permit, I have never impugned his patriotism.

Mr. HILL. I know, but——

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman is very gratuitous in intimating that I reflected on his patriotism.

Mr. HILL. In my opinion this legislation goes too far. I say that it overlooks what is going to occur after the war. We have got to have capital from citizens of foreign nations interested in all forms of industry here, in the future just as we have had it in the past. This bill is not a question between government and government. It is a question of men who have come here honestly and loyally and faithfully and invested private funds, and this bill practically says that we will confiscate those funds, and that we will use them for our purposes. I have not any objection to that, but it adds that when the war is over we will leave it to the disposition of Congress as to whether we will pay it back or not. I do not believe that is honest, gentlemen. I do not believe this Government can afford to be dishonest, and I do not believe the terms of this bill are honest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote upon the pending amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report it. Does the gentleman want to modify the amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. I want to know if it was modified by the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be permitted to modify the amendment, and the Clerk will report it as modified.

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 30, line 19, after the word "enemy," insert:

"Resident within the territory, or a subject or citizen residing outside of the United States, of any nation with which the United States is at war, or resident within the territory, or a subject or citizen residing outside of the United States, of any ally of any nation with which the United States is at war."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LENROOT. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 19.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I have one other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 31, line 17, after the word "enemy," insert the words "by any person not holding a license under the provisions of this act."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I have proposed to insert, after the word "enemy," in line 17, page 31, the words "by any person not holding a license under the provisions of this act." If that is not included, you have made unlawful the payment of money to an enemy although a license has been granted to trade with the enemy. Surely the committee does not wish any such condition as that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That any person, not an enemy or ally of enemy, holding a mortgage, pledge, or lien on or other right in the nature of security in, property of an enemy or ally of enemy, may, after default, dispose of such property under such rules and regulations and after such notice as the Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe; and such notice shall have in all respects the same force and effect as if duly served upon the enemy, or ally of enemy, personally: Provided, That no such rule or regulation shall require that notice shall be given in any case in which by law or by the terms of the contract by which such mortgage, pledge, lien, or other right was created, no notice was, prior to the passage of this act, required; and that in case where by law or the terms of such contract notice is required, no longer period of notice is or shall be required: And provided further, That if on any such disposition a surplus shall remain after the satisfaction of such mortgage, pledge, lien, or other right in the nature of security, notice of that fact shall be given to the Secretary of Commerce pursuant to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and such surplus shall be held subject to the further order of the Secretary of Commerce.

That any contract entered into prior to the beginning of the war between any citizen of the United States or any corporation organized within the United States and an enemy or ally of enemy, the terms of which provide for a termination thereof upon notice from such citizen or corporation, may be terminated by like notice served by such citizen or corporation upon the alien property custodian, and said notice so served shall have in all respects the same force and effect as if duly served upon the enemy or ally of enemy personally, in accordance with the terms of the contract.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Does this section apply to mortgages on real property?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It applies to all property, real and personal. Mortgages, as a rule, apply to real property; liens and pledges apply to personal property.

Mr. MANN. Have we a right to go into a State and prescribe how mortgaged real estate shall be shown, contrary to the statutes of the State? I have always supposed that as to real property the State had absolute control over the method of transferring, and that the General Government had no jurisdiction whatever over it.

Now, here is a provision which says, apparently, that if I hold a mortgage upon real property which belongs to an alien enemy—and there is much of such property held by people in the United States—that on the default—and there must be default in payment, because they can not make payment—I shall dispose of the property under the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce.

Now, as to real property in my State, the law says the mortgagee can not dispose of it; he can not sell it. It has to be sold by order of court. Of course the mortgagor can sell it subject to the mortgage. This undertakes to say that the mortgagee shall on default sell the property under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce. It may be that we do have authority where the State law fixes the notice to be served, to change that notice. The law of my State would provide that with the real property held in Illinois belonging to a German resident in Germany, notice should be given by publication, and published notice should be mailed to the resident's address in Germany. We have forbidden the sending of such mail. It may be as to that alien enemy we could do away with the notice, but I am very sure—although I am not so sure, as I am not sure about anything, but I used to be a lawyer who examined title to real estate, and I have passed millions and millions of dollars of real estate on examination of title—but I am fairly confident, although not really sure, that I would not pass a title acquired in this way. I do not believe anybody in my State would do so.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I make a further suggestion to the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I move to strike out the last two words.

Might I further observe, in harmony with what the gentleman has said, that I am sure in my own mind that the gentleman is correct? This is absolutely null and void so far as ever being enforceable is concerned, because Congress has no authority to pass a law fixing the way, within the confines of a State, for real property to be transferred. It can not be done. Every State has its own mortgage laws, and those laws have to be followed. In some States aliens can not hold property within its confines, and some States say they can within a limited amount. We can not change the law either of the right of an alien to hold property or restrict his right to a certain amount, or say that a mortgage held by him on real property under the laws of that State shall be of no value.

I would like to make this further observation, in harmony with that, if I may: We have designated a man as an "enemy." He is an enemy. He owns a piece of land under the laws of the State upon which there is a mortgage. In other words, he is indebted to a citizen of the United States, which citizen has a mortgage on the land, and under the laws of the State the alien has a right to own that land. Under this we forbid that man from making any payment or doing any business with respect to this land. Now, by this paragraph we say that if default in the payment occurs—and there will be default, because the man can not make the payment—we provide an entirely new and different method by which the mortgagee can come in and take the property. Let alone its legality and its constitutionality, is it in any sense right or just?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. It violates the terms of the contract.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. What is the status of either a mortgagor or a mortgagee with the war on, without any legislation?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would not want to answer that offhand.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is not the purpose of this section simply to start the machinery in motion by serving notice upon the custodian of the enemy's property? It does not abrogate or do away with the usual forms of law for the sale of pledged property. Is not that the purpose of this section?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not understand that that is the purpose or the effect. This permits the disposition of the property after the default.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is notice. Would you not have to pursue the same course——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Any person not an enemy—that is, a citizen of the United States—who holds a mortgage against property belonging to an enemy, "may after default dispose of such property under such rules and regulations and after such notice as the Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe."

Mr. McKENZIE. Notice served upon the custodian.

Mr. BUTLER. Could he not do it?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think he could under the laws of the State, which are at variance with any such process as this.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If it is true, as has been stated here—and I think it is—that contractual relations are ended on the outbreak of the war, there is no contract existing between our citizen and the citizen of the foreign country. Now, therefore, there being no contract between them, unless Congress makes some legislation by which the machinery can be started, you can not start anything in any court.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not agree with the gentleman that the contract is abrogated by the declaration of war.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I take it for granted on the statement of gentlemen of the committee. I have not investigated it myself. But those relations are at least suspended, are they not?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They are suspended.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And during the continuance of the hostilities you can do nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, there is no amendment pending, and I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I present an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 34, line 12, after the word "Commerce," insert a comma and the words "with the approval of the President."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is offered with a view of making uniform the various provisions of the bill. In the section just passed, section 7, in subsection (c), the Secretary of Commerce is to do what he is required to do "by direction of the President," in the first instance, and "with the approval of the President" in the second instance. In other subsections throughout the bill it is contemplated that the President shall approve what is done.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not catch the gentleman's amendment, I am sorry to say. Will he kindly indicate what it is?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That any person, not an enemy, or ally of enemy, claiming any interest, right, or title in any money or other property which may have been conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the alien property custodian hereunder, and held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States, or to whom any debt may be owing from an enemy, or ally of enemy, whose property or any part thereof shall have been conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the alien property custodian hereunder, and held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States, may file with the said custodian a statement or notice of his claim under oath and in such form and containing such particulars as the said custodian shall require; and, if said person so filing notice shall, within three months after the end of the war, institute a suit in equity in the district court of the United States for the district in which such claimant resides, or, if a corporation, where it has its principal place of business (to which suit the alien property custodian or the Treasurer of the United States, as the case may be, shall be made a party defendant), to establish the interest, right, title, or debt so claimed, then the money or other property of the enemy, or ally of enemy, against whom such interest, right, or title is asserted, or debt claimed, shall be retained in the custody of the alien property custodian or in the Treasury of the United States, as provided in this act, and until any final judgment or decree which shall be entered in favor of the claimant shall be fully satisfied by payment or conveyance, transfer, or assignment by the defendant or by the alien property custodian or Treasurer of the United States on order of the court, or until final judgment or decree shall be entered against the claimant, or suit otherwise terminated.

Except as herein provided, the money or other property conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the alien property custodian shall not be liable to lien, attachment, garnishment, trustee process, or execution, or subject to any order or decree of any court.

This section shall not apply, however, to money paid to the alien property custodian, under section 10 hereof.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey and Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to offer a pro forma amendment?

Mr. MANN. The spelling of the word "section" should be corrected there on line 1 of page 37.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will make the correction indicated by the gentleman from Illinois.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONTAGUE: Page 36, line 1, after the word "shall," strike out the word "within" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at any time before the expiration of."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey offers the following amendment: Page 36, line 19, after the word "terminated," insert the following:

"Provided, That if any property belonging to an enemy or ally of the enemy insurance company be delivered to the alien property custodian or deposited in the Treasury of the United States under the provisions of this act, and any insurance company not an enemy or ally of the enemy shall claim any right, title, or interest in such property which has been so delivered to the alien property custodian or to the Treasurer of the United States, such insurance company, not an enemy or ally of the enemy, may institute suit in equity in the district court of the United States for the district in which the principal office of the company is located, or in the Court of Claims, for the purpose of establishing his right, title, or interest, and procuring a decree thereon, and such court may thereupon, on proper showing, direct that the property in the custody of the alien property custodian or of the Treasurer of the United States, to which such company may show itself to be entitled, be delivered to such company, and such case may be heard and determined and the property delivered before the end of the war. The alien property custodian or the Treasurer of the United States, as the case may be, shall be made party defendant to such suit."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, this amendment meets a special case. It has been submitted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] who, with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], is in charge of this bill, and he has no objection to it.

It is well known that some of the insurance companies in this country reinsure in foreign insurance companies that have branches here. At least one of those foreign insurance companies—the Munich Insurance Co.—has a manager here who is a foreigner, and who may not get out. This bill would cancel all the reinsurance carried in that company; and inasmuch as the premiums on this reinsurance for long periods of time were paid to the Munich Insurance Co., on the cancellation of the reinsurance the premiums so paid would or should be returned. In the case of one of the insurance companies of my city—the Firemen's—these return premiums would amount to over $300,000, and under the present provisions of this bill that money would be tied up until three months after the end of the war and until the termination of a suit brought, if the money went into the hands of the alien property custodian. This provision, which, as I say, has been submitted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] and approved by him, is to allow the insurance company immediately to obtain the return of these return premiums. These return premiums belong to them and not to the foreigners upon the cancellation of the contract, and there is no reason why the money should not be returned to the American insurance company. If any further explanation is needed, I shall be glad to give it.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is correct in stating that his proposed amendment was submitted to me this morning in conference with some gentlemen from New Jersey who are engaged in the insurance business. The facts, in brief, are these: There are 14 domestic insurance companies which have underwritten a portion of their risks with enemy insurance companies. In order to underwrite their insurance they, of course, were obliged to pay to these enemy insurance companies a portion of the premiums. By the provisions of this act these contracts, made between the enemy insurance companies and our domestic insurance companies, fall and become void. By the provisions of this act also the custodian takes possession of the property of these alien insurance companies. Now, what is that property? In every State in the Union in which these alien insurance companies are doing business they have been obliged to place in the hands of the insurance department security as collateral for the repayment of these premiums that have been paid to them, which would again be returned to the domestic insurance companies either on the lapse of the insurance or on the cancellation thereof. Now, when, by the provisions of this act, the custodian takes into his possession all the property of the alien insurance company, these 14 domestic insurance companies—and there may be a greater number, but these gentlemen mentioned only 14—would be obliged, under the present provisions of the act, to wait until three months after the expiration of the war before they could recover, from this property which is in the hands of the custodian, these returned premiums, which they certainly ought to be entitled to immediately upon the cancellation of the insurance contracts. Therefore upon the submission of the question to me—I am sorry that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] was not present at the interview—it seemed that it was no more than equitable and just that this property, on coming into the hands of the custodian or the Treasurer of the United States, should be given to our domestic insurance companies immediately upon the affirmance of a judgment in their behalf by a court of competent jurisdiction. That is all there is in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Did that amendment come in at the end of section 9?

Mr. DEWALT. No; after the word "terminated."

Mr. MANN. Very well. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: At the end of section 9 insert the following:

"That if any property belonging to a loyal citizen of the United States who, by virtue of his residence in a foreign country, comes within the definition of the word 'enemy' as used in this act, is delivered to the alien property custodian or deposited in the Treasury of the United States under the provisions of this act, and the owner thereof afterwards removes to a neutral country or returns to the United States; or if it is ascertained that such owner was not in fact, by virtue of his residence when this act takes effect, properly included within the definition of the word 'enemy' as used herein; or if by inheritance from or by will duly executed by one who comes within the definition of the word 'enemy' as used herein, a citizen of the United States residing therein becomes entitled to all or any part of or interest in any property which has been so delivered to the alien property custodian or to the Treasurer of the United States, the Secretary of Commerce, may, upon application, by or on behalf of such person and proper showing of the facts, authorize and direct the return to him, in such manner as the Secretary shall determine, of any such property or any part or interest therein to which he may be so entitled. If the Secretary of Commerce does not grant such application within three months after the same is made, the person so entitled may institute a suit in equity in the district court of the United States for the district in which such person resides or in the Court of Claims for the purpose of establishing his right and procuring a decree thereon, and such court may thereupon, on proper showing, direct that the property in the custody of the alien property custodian or in the Treasury of the United States, to which the claimant may show himself to be thus entitled, be delivered to him, and such case may be heard and determined and the property returned before the end of the war. The alien property custodian or the Treasurer of the United States, as the case may be, shall be made party defendant to such suit."

Mr. DEWALT. After consultation with the gentleman in charge of the bill I will say that there is no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, but if he desires to explain it——

Mr. MANN. I introduced it as a House bill, so as to have it in print.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would be very glad if the gentleman would make a little explanation of it, because it occurred to some of us that the matter was already covered by the terms of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I will not undertake to be certain that it is not covered already by the terms of the bill. This amendment, to be frank about it, was sent to me by the Merchants' Loan & Trust Co., of Chicago, one of the most responsible organizations in the United States, with the statement that in their opinion it was not covered by the terms of the bill, and it seemed to be perfectly patent that no one would object to the provisions in this amendment. I introduced it as a House bill in order to get it into print and have it before the committee, and I offer it now with the idea that there is no objection to what is intended to be covered by the amendment. This bill will pass through another body, and will pass through conference. I think it is very likely that some of these things may be consolidated with other provisions of the bill, but I do not see how anybody could really object to the provision that is here made. If an American now in Germany, and hence an alien enemy, has his property placed in the hands of the custodian and then he manages to get back to the United States, there is no reason why the money should not be turned over to him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When he manages to get back to the United States, as the gentleman says, does not his return, ipso facto, remove his enemy character, as if he had never been out of the country?

Mr. MANN. But his property is in the hands of the custodian and I doubt if there is any way by which he could get it out unless we permit him to make the application.

THE CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 10. That nothing contained in this act shall be held to make unlawful any of the following acts:

(a) An enemy, or ally of enemy, may file and prosecute in the United States an application for letters patent, or for registration of trade-mark, print, label, or copyright, and may pay any fees therefor in accordance with and as required by the provisions of existing law. Any such enemy, or ally of enemy, who is unable during war, or within six months thereafter, on account of conditions arising out of war, to file any such application, or to pay any official fee, or to take any action required by law within the prescribed period, may be granted an extension of nine months beyond the expiration of said period, provided the nation of which the said applicant is a citizen, subject, or corporation shall extend substantially similar privileges to citizens and corporations of the United States.

(b) Any citizen of the United States, or any corporation organized within the United States, may pay to an enemy or ally of enemy any tax, annuity, or fee which may be required by the laws of such enemy or ally of enemy nation in relation to patents and trade-marks, prints, labels, and copyrights; and any such citizen or corporation may file and prosecute an application for letters patent or for registration of trade-mark, print, label, or copyright in the country of an enemy, or of an ally of enemy, after first submitting such application to the Secretary of Commerce and receiving license so to file and prosecute.

(c) Any citizen of the United States or any corporation organized within the United States who desires to manufacture, or cause to be manufactured, a machine, manufacture, composition of matter, or design, or to carry on or cause to be carried on a process under any patent or copyrighted matter owned or controlled by an enemy or ally of enemy at any time during the existence of a state of war may apply to the Federal Trade Commission for a license; and said commission is hereby authorized to grant such a license, nonexclusive or exclusive, as it shall deem best, provided it shall be of the opinion that such grant is for the public welfare, and that the applicant is able and intends in good faith to manufacture, or cause to be manufactured, the machine, manufacture, composition of matter, or design, or to carry on or cause to be carried on the process or to use the copyrighted matter. The Federal Trade Commission may prescribe the conditions of this license and the rules and regulations under which it may be granted and the fee which shall be charged therefor, not exceeding $100 and not exceeding 1 per cent of the fund deposited as hereinafter provided.

(d) The licensee shall file with the Federal Trade Commission a full statement of the extent of the use and enjoyment of the license, in such form and at such stated periods (at least annually) as the commission may prescribe; and the licensee shall pay at such times as may be required to the alien property custodian (or to such other officer as the President shall direct) not to exceed 5 per cent of the gross sums received by the licensee from the sale of said inventions or use of the copyrighted matter, or 5 per cent of the value of the use of such inventions or copyrighted matter to the licensee as established by the Federal Trade Commission; and sums so paid shall be deposited by said alien property custodian (or by such other officer as the President shall direct) forthwith in the Treasury of the United States as a trust fund for the said licensee and for the owner of the said patent or copyright registration as hereinafter provided, to be paid from the Treasury upon order of the court, as provided in subdivision (f) of this section, or upon the direction of the alien property custodian, or such other officer as the President shall direct.

(e) Unless surrendered or terminated as provided in this act, any license granted hereunder shall continue during the term fixed in the license or in the absence of any such limitation during the term of the patent or copyright registration under which it is granted. Upon violation by the licensee of any of the provisions of this act, or of the conditions of the license, the Federal Trade Commission may, after due notice and hearing, cancel any license granted by it.

(f) The owner of any patent or copyright under which a license is granted hereunder may, at any time within one year after the end of the war, file a bill in equity against the licensee in the district court of the United States for the district in which the said licensee resides, or, if a corporation, in which it has its principal place of business (to which suit the Treasurer of the United States shall be made a party), for recovery from the said licensee for all use and enjoyment of the said patented invention or copyrighted matter: Provided, however, That whenever suit is brought, as above, notice shall be filed with the alien property custodian (or with such other officer as the President shall direct) within 30 days after date of entry of suit: Provided further, That the licensee may make any and all defenses which would be available were no license granted. The court on due proceedings had may adjudge and decree to the said owner payment of a resonable royalty. The amount of said judgment and decree, when final, shall be paid on order of the court to the owner of the patent from the fund deposited by the licensee, so far as such deposit will satisfy said judgment and decree; and the said payment shall be in full or partial satisfaction of said judgment and decree, as the fact may appear; and if, after payment of all such judgments and decrees, there shall remain any balance of said deposit, such balance shall be repaid to the licensee on order of the alien property custodian (or such other officer as the President shall direct). If no suit is brought within one year after the end of the war, or no notice is filed as above required, then the licensee shall not be liable to make any further deposits, and all funds deposited by him shall be repaid to him on order of the alien property custodian (or such other officer as the President shall direct). Upon entry of suit and notice filed as above required, or upon repayment of funds as above provided, the liability of the licensee to make further reports to the Federal Trade Commission shall cease.

If suit is brought as above provided, the court may at any time terminate the license, and may in such event issue an injunction to restrain the licensee from infringement thereafter, or the court, in case the licensee prior to suit shall have made investment of capital based on possession of the license, may continue the license for such period and upon such terms and with such royalties as it shall find to be just and reasonable.

(g) Any enemy, or ally of enemy, may institute and prosecute suits in equity against any person other than a licensee under this act to enjoin infringement of letters patent and copyrights in the United States owned or controlled by said enemy or ally of enemy, in the same manner and to the extent that he would be entitled so to do if the United States was not at war.

(h) Except as provided in this section, nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the prosecution or maintenance of any suit or action at law or in equity by an enemy or ally of enemy in any court within the United States. All powers of attorney heretofore or hereafter granted by an enemy or ally of enemy to any person within the United States, in so far as they may be requisite to the performance of acts authorized in subsections (a) and (g) of this section, shall be valid.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, on page 37, line 8, the first word "any" should be "an." A typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 40, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "a license is granted hereunder may, at any time within one year after the end of the war, file a bill in equity against the," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "a license is granted hereunder may after the end of the war and until the expiration of a year thereafter file a bill in equity against the."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, line 3, after the word "States" strike out the period and insert a comma, and in lieu thereof add the words "prior to the end of the war: Provided further, That an enemy or ally of the enemy may defend by counsel any suit in equity or action at law which may be brought against him."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, line 8, after the word "or," insert the words "if such commission shall so order."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I understand that this section was drawn by the Department of Justice; is that so?

Mr. DEWALT. And the Patent Office.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And the Patent Office in consultation. I assume that the language must have been drawn with care, and yet it is very strange language. I want to invite the gentleman's attention to see if I am all wrong or whether the language is incomplete.

I direct the gentleman's attention to the subsection (c), page 38. I am referring to the language describing the things that are patented or copyrighted, and this is the language that is used:

Any citizen of the United States or any corporation organized within the United States who desires to manufacture, or cause to be manufactured, a machine, manufacture, composition of matter, or design—

And so forth.

Now, that language "composition of matter," if taken in a reasonable sense, comprehends everything in God's created universe. But is it not so general, is it not so comprehensive, that the court would refuse to construe it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is the exact language of the patent law copied into the bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is that the exclusive language of the patent law, or is there other language and then that added as a sort of basket clause for fear that they had left out something? The language frequently used is "manufacture, machine, design, preparation, compound," and things of that kind. None of that is in here except "manufacture" and "design." I have no desire to criticize or ask this to be changed if it is going to do the business.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have the patent law here in pamphlet form, and some of these amendments that were added were copied from that law directly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have had an extended correspondence with many distinguished physicians in the United States, beginning with the Drs. Mayo, in my own State, which caused me to introduce a bill which embraced all of these things relating to medicine compounds; but, of course, I readily laid that bill aside in view of this coming out, but I want to be sure that this does the business. The preparations that the physicians are interested in are medicines that have been manufactured and compounded by German scientists, patented in the United States, and now can not be obtained for love or money unless they are permitted to be manufactured in the United States.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is the gentleman in doubt as to whether or not the medicinal preparations he has in mind are covered by these words?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will say to the gentleman that after a good deal of consideration, the conclusion was inexorable that it did cover just the preparations the gentleman speaks of. I do not know of any other language that could more completely cover it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am sure that the words "composition of matter" include it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not know anything that it does not include, but courts very frequently say that language is so general and indefinite that therefore they will refuse to apply it to a specific case. What would be the objection to inserting the words "medicine, medicinal compound, or preparation"?

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is the language not only of the statute but the language suggested by the Commissioner of Patents himself as covering medicinal preparations. I am not a patent lawyer, but I think, under the long adjudications on this subject, the gentleman will find that this covers all those subject matters.

Mr. DEWALT. I refer the gentleman to line 9:

or cause to be carried on, a process under any patent or copyrighted matter——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I was about to revert to that after we had finished with the first. Assuming that the language does comprehend the medicinal preparation we have in mind, what is the authority conferred to do in respect to that—to carry on a process under any patent or copyrighted matter owned or controlled by an enemy or ally of an enemy at any time during the existence of a state of war. I would not be surprised if the court would hold that that language would permit the manufacture of a preparation in the nature of a medicine, but it does not exactly say so.

Mr. DEWALT. I do not think there is any doubt about it. You could not make it any broader, and, as it is inclusive, it would not be exclusive.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Oh, yes; you could; but if the gentleman has given careful consideration to that feature, I shall not try to be captious about it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, what does the gentleman think about the language just below—giving to the Federal Trade Commission the power to issue either a nonexclusive or an exclusive license to the patentee? In other words, what does the gentleman think about the propriety of giving to the Federal Trade Commission the power to give to one concern an exclusive license to manufacture any of this material?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. My answer would have to be confined within my own knowledge, and my knowledge of the manufacture of patented articles is exceedingly limited. However, my knowledge in respect to the medicinal preparation that the Drs. Mayo brought to our attention some weeks ago, and that I had brought to my attention in the Orient shortly after the war started, is fairly full. In other words, there is but one concern in the United States that is competent to manufacture this particular medicinal compound.

Mr. COX. What is the compound?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The compound is salvarsan and neo-salvarsan.

Mr. COX. Does it not include another one called aspirin?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Possibly; but the medical men are agreed that there is one concern in Philadelphia, controlled by Dr. Schamberg, that has made, under license from the German patentees since the war has begun, this compound which is better than that which the Germans heretofore have manufactured and sold in the United States. The ingredients of this are such powerful drugs that unless the compound is made with the greatest care by the most accurate scientists and in laboratories perfectly fitted for the work, a patient who takes it is likely to receive serious injury, and so the Surgeon General's Office of the War Department and the officers of the medical associations with whom I have conferred are alike agreed that any license to manufacture this particular compound should be exclusive to this one concern, and I assume that is the reason that language was put in.

Mr. DEWALT. That was the reason.

Mr. COX. In order to get a pure compound.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Absolutely pure.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman have any knowledge or information of what is known as aspirin? I am somewhat interested in that, because I have taken large quantities, especially German aspirin. Are there any concerns in this country manufacturing that?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am sorry to say that I do not know.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have a nephew who is a chemist, and he tells me that he can make aspirin just as well as they do in Germany, but that he has not dared to do it because of the patents and the penalties for a violation of the patent laws. He said, however, that any chemist can make it.

Mr. COX. I think about two years ago I bought what was said to be the last ounce in Indiana and I paid $7 for that ounce.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not want to take the gentleman off the floor, but I thought he was through.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If we are not in too big a rush, I would like the indulgence of the committee for two or three minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] has asked the name of this particular compound, and it has been given, some further additional words might be appropriate. This is the only specific ever yet discovered for syphilitic conditions, and all the world knows, conversant with the facts, that syphilis is contracted in an innocent way just as often as, if not more often than, in any other way. When I was in the Orient, two years ago, I went through several hospitals. I recall one distinctly that was devoted exclusively to children afflicted with syphilis. They are in a helpless, miserable, hopeless condition. Why? Because, I was informed, that the price of this compound had been so exorbitantly raised that it was beyond charity patients. That, however, was not enough of a proposition to disturb us particularly in this country, but the physicians of this country became greatly alarmed about two years ago over the difficulty of securing these various compounds, of which this is the main ingredient. Some came in the Deutschland, but not sufficient. I have a letter from one of the leading surgeons of the country which says that the total supply in the United States to-day is practically exhausted and that no more can be found here at all.

Now, the German agents who represented the patentees of this company conducted themselves, to my mind, in a most despicable manner. They raised the price of this compound enormously because they saw they had a monopoly and could do it. The Drs. Mayo, of Minnesota, brought this to the attention of Congress early in May and requested that this compound be manufactured by Dr. Schamburg and that the patents be suspended.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. COX. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that it can be manufactured in this country just as well as in Germany. If I recollect correctly, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] the other day said the manufacture of this particular drug in this country was a total failure so far as the effect of the compound upon the individual was concerned.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will ask unanimous consent to extend as a part of my remarks a communication that I received from Dr. Stokes, who is the head of the dermatological section of the Mayos Hospital, of Rochester, Minn., in which he goes very fully into this subject.

Mr. COX. That will make it authoritative from the Drs. Mayo themselves?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Dr. Mayo himself subscribed to all these statements from Dr. Stokes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Do I understand they have been experimenting with the Philadelphia preparation?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Not only experimenting, but they have manufactured it for a considerable period of time; but now they do not manufacture it, because the German patents will not permit it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has any action been brought restraining its manufacture?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They had only the permit of the German patentee to manufacture, and after the war started they could not manufacture.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But does the gentleman know whether any action has been taken restraining them from manufacture?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They can not manufacture without infringing upon the patents.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If it is asserted that it is for the interest of public health and they could show that it is impossible to obtain the original article, would any court in this country restrain them from manufacturing it?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The court would have to comply with the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But is not the law well established that where the infringement is such that the infringing party can not obtain the original article and the owner of the patent can not supply, then the court will simply order the keeping of complete and accurate account and would permit the manufacture, pending the action?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think the court would confine itself to a construction of the law.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of the matter indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

As the head of the section of dermatology and syphilology in the Mayo Clinic, I beg leave to ask your attention, and that of the Council of Defense, to the conditions existing at this time in this country in regard to the drug known as salvarsan and neosalvarsan, used in the treatment of syphilis. As you know, both these drugs have been patented in this country by the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co., of New York, whom I understand to be the purchasers of the original Ehrlich patents. (This is a misstatement; Prof. Schamberg informs me the patents are held by the German company and can therefore legally be suspended or abrogated.) These patents I understand to be very extensive in their scope and to include not only the names under which the drugs are marketed but all the details of their manufacture. In fact, it is said to be virtually impossible by any variation upon them to manufacture the drugs without infringement and consequent suit in the courts.

The salvarsan and neosalvarsan supplied to the profession of this country up to the outbreak of the European war was manufactured in Germany, under the direction of Ehrlich's laboratories in Frankfort, and marketed in this country at a price of $3.50 per maximum dose (0.6 gram salvarsan and 0.9 gram neosalvarsan). After the outbreak of the war the importation of both drugs was interfered with by the British blockade, and the price rapidly reached a speculative level, to my personal knowledge, as high as $16 a dose. The Farbwerke-Hoechst Co. then inaugurated a system of direct distribution, raising the price to $4.50 a dose, ostensibly to cover increased cost. At this price original salvarsan was available for some time, but the supply of neosalvarsan was rapidly exhausted. The advance in price and the difficulty of securing the preparation, of course, still further restricted the use in this country of one of the most important curative agents in existence.

Finally, as a result of the complete suspension of imports, the entire supply of both neosalvarsan and salvarsan in this country failed entirely, and a large proportion of the profession was obliged to return to the antiquated methods in use with mercury alone, a slower and less effective procedure, making abortive cure out of the question and admittedly unsatisfactory in controlling syphilis as a contagious disease.

In this emergency the Dermatological Research Laboratories of the Philadelphia Polyclinic, which had for some time, under the directorship of Prof. Jay Frank Schamberg, been studying a salvarsan of their own manufacture, identical with the German product, entered into a gentlemen's agreement with the holders of the German patents by which they were permitted to supply the profession of this country a salvarsan of domestic manufacture. This product was supplied under the name arsenobenzol. Its distribution was allowed by the German patentees on the understanding that as soon as they could reimport the manufacture of arsenobenzol would be suspended.

Arsenobenzol, as prepared under Prof. Schamberg's direction, is identical in composition with, and equal in clinical efficiency to, original salvarsan (606) of the Ehrlich patents. This has been attested by the studies of the council on pharmacy and chemistry of the American Medical Association. My own impressions and those of other clinicians who have used the drug all seem to agree that its efficiency is the same as that of salvarsan, and that its toxicity and the incidence of unfavorable complications after its use is, if anything, lower than that of the German product. Prof. Schamberg and his collaborators, Drs. Kolmer and Raizlss, have made a thoroughgoing study of the drug from every angle, and there can be no reasonable question that they are in position to furnish this country with a product thoroughly surrounded by all the guaranties demanded in the case of so powerful and potentially dangerous a therapeutic agent.

I understand that during the period when German imports were suspended, some 25,000 doses of arsenobenzol were supplied to physicians in this country. The manufacture of the drug was suspended in the latter part of July, 1916, as the result of the reimportation of the German salvarsan through special arrangement with the belligerent powers. German salvarsan and neosalvarsan have been supplied to the American market at the price of $4.50 a dose until the supply has been again cut off by the suspension of submarine commerce between this country and Germany via the Deutschland and the recent rupture of diplomatic relations. Recent information in my hands estimates the amount of salvarsan and neosalvarsan still available in the hands of the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co. as sufficient for two months if the supply is husbanded.

I might mention at this point that the manufacture of arsenical compounds practically identical with salvarsan has been carried on in the belligerent countries since the beginning of the war. Kharsivan is, I think, the name of the British product, manufactured by the Burroughs Welcome Co. Diarsenol and neodiarsenol are manufactured at Toronto under the direction of the Canadian Government by the Synthetic Drug Co. (Ltd.), the direct supervision being carried out by the medical department of the University of Toronto. A good deal of the former drug has been used in this country, although its importation is an infringement of the German patents. Reports of its unstable character have appeared in the literature, and I have myself within a short time nearly had disastrous results in five cases on a single day from the use of this product, and have known of other serious effects. In view of the fact that its importation is a violation of the patent law, and that it is an unstable and apparently dangerous substitute, it can scarcely be looked upon as a source of supply in an emergency.

In this connection I might also call your attention to the increased toxicity of German salvarsan and neosalvarsan itself. The recent importations have been markedly inferior to the product marketed before the war. This has been abundantly testified to by reports appearing in the Journal of the American Medical Association and by my own experience. In the course of a series of 500 injections during August, September, and October of this year, I have witnessed every known type of reaction to the drug, more reactions than I had seen in 3,000 previous injections, even under a rigidly exacting technique. On a single day, from one control number, six of my patients had nitritoid crises on the table, any one of which might have terminated fatally. Dr. Ormsby, of Chicago, and other clinicians, had similar experiences. All of us had abundant occasion to realize our helplessness, and to appreciate that to leave the manufacture and sale of so powerful and potentially toxic drug to the vicissitudes of commercial expediency is a fundamentally short-sighted public policy.

With reference to the current price of salvarsan the following considerations are in point: Prof. Schamberg has stated that if such steps are taken as will permit its unrestricted American manufacture, it can be supplied to hospitals at $1 or less per maximum dose. If this is possible, it is apparent that the German patentees have reaped prodigious profits from their monopoly and that it would be reasonable now to subordinate the interest of this lucrative monopoly to the public good. The patents on salvarsan have still 11 years to run, and it is, to say the least, under protest that those of us who work with it all the time and realize the immense public benefit that could be derived from it see the sick of this country the victims of this form of extortion. This country is ripening for a public-health campaign against syphilis, and to its inauguration many of us are bending our best efforts. To have to delay the initiation of this movement for 11 years, until the claims of the patentees shall have been satisfied on an exorbitant scale, seems intolerable. It is still more unthinkable when one realizes that an effective campaign against syphilis is an integral part of national preparedness and must take its place among measures of national defense. The effect of the mobilization of troops, the increase of the personnel of Army and Navy, the importance of the health of enlisted men is being daily better appreciated. Salvarsan in abundance is therefore a weapon, and it would seem to be quite within the province of the Executive to command it as such, or to provide for its home manufacture. The protection of the civil population after hostilities, no less than that of the Army and Navy, deserves consideration in this connection.

Realizing this situation, and believing that the state of our relations with Germany affords the psychological and practical opportunity for terminating this unreasonable monopoly, a number of us have sounded Prof. Schamberg in his willingness to place his facilities at the disposal of the Government and the medical profession of this country. It appears from his communications to Dr. William Allen Pusey, of Chicago (now in my hands), and the communication to me inclosed herewith, that suitable governmental action will make it possible for him to supply arsenobenzol to the Government and to the profession of this country in quantities sufficient for all our needs. Suitable action, apparently in the form of an abrogation of these patents by Congress, will make possible the radical reductions in the price so much to be desired in the interest of public health. Prof. Schamberg, as you will note, would welcome the supervision of the United States Public Health and Marine Hospital Service in the manufacture of the drug. If the Council of National Defense will give this matter its consideration, I have no doubt that Prof. Schamberg would be pleased to appear before this body and make known in full his point of view upon the matter, and the results of his study of the situation. I understand that the German patentees have endeavored to carry through an agreement with him which will maintain the price far above the figure at which he could place it on the market. From such an arrangement he has endeavored to hold back in the effort to accomplish a radical readjustment. I would respectfully urge that governmental action in this matter should be prompt, or it will be ineffectual, and relief from the existing unjust state of affairs will be delayed at least 11 years.

I beg to thank you for the opportunity of bringing this matter to your attention, and remain,

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN H. STOKES, M. D.,
Mayo Clinic.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words simply for the purpose of calling attention to what I take to be a typographical error in the print. In line 7, on page 37, the word "registration" seems to be misspelled.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will make the correction.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment and ask that it be read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That the provisions of section (c) shall take effect in the event only that the Government of any nation with which the United States is at war abrogates, suspends, or in any manner limits within its own territory the full and unhampered use and enjoyment of a patent or patent right of a citizen of the United States, and the President shall make proclamation thereof."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, so far the only purpose for a provision of this kind that has been stated is the desire to make salvarsan in this country. Whether or not salvarsan can be made successfully here is a question of grave doubt. The medical profession, as I stated the other day, are frank to say that the preparations so far made have not been successful. If it is necessary to make salvarsan, and if it can not be imported from Germany, it strikes me we might find some other manner of permitting its manufacture rather than resorting to the extreme measure of abrogating all patent rights. The committee has not stated that the German Government has abrogated patent rights applying to American citizens. There are more patents owned by American citizens exploited in Germany than there are German patents exploited in this country. When these patents were granted the Government pledged a monopoly for a certain number of years on those articles, and now to go back on its word is just as dishonorable as the violation of a treaty. It is treating the certificate of patent—the solemn obligation of this Government—as a "scrap of paper."

If the committee were in a position to state to the House that the German Government had taken such action in reference to patents owned by American citizens there might be some justification, but the committee is honest in saying that they do not know. We are bound by our own laws, as well as by treaty, to protect patents owned by foreign citizens. And with the one exception of this medical preparation, there has been nothing presented to justify this section.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. I was not present the other afternoon when the gentleman discussed the proposition that they could not successfully manufacture it in this country. They have a formula, have they not?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They have a formula, it is true.

Mr. WINGO. Can the gentleman explain why they can not manufacture it here?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I suppose for the same reason that we can not raise Turkish tobaccos or make Pilsner beer here. They have tried it in Canada, but I will say to the gentleman that reliable physicians in New York have been using the Canadian and Philadelphia preparations, and have taken care to warn their patients that a substitute preparation was being used.

Mr. WINGO. Is salvarsan a chemical compound?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is.

Mr. WINGO. Then, it is a proposition of mixing chemicals?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. I will state to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that I am not an expert on salvarsan or on the reason why salvarsan is used, and I know nothing about it. But I say this, that if it is necessary to make it here, and if it can be manufactured here, we can do so without this section. There is no need of this section in the bill. Its purpose is dishonest. There is no necessity for it, and it is going to give justification to retaliation in Germany, which will result in enormous losses to American citizens. I am not interested in salvarsan. I am keenly interested in our national honor and the rights of our citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is mistaken in thinking that the only patent and remedy which really would be affected by this paragraph is salvarsan.

Some years ago I introduced in the House a bill, which was very carefully considered by the Committee on Patents, reported favorably to the House, and passed by the House, designed to require a working in the United States of patents granted to foreign citizens. At that time I collected, a portion of which I showed to the Committee on Patents of the House, a very large number of samples of different things—medicines, in some cases dyes, and things of that sort, giving the price in the United States, where the patent was not required to be worked, and having purchased the same amount across the line in Canada, where the patent was required to be worked, and in many cases for the same amount of money you received ten times the amount of the product across the line at Niagara, in Canada, that you could buy in Buffalo, on this side.

There are many of those cases. They still exist. That bill passed the House. But all the patent attorneys in the United States woke up while the bill was pending in the Senate, and they poured in such a volley upon it that it never received favorable consideration there. It is the business of the patent attorneys in the United States to prevent any adverse change in patent laws. They have succeeded in doing it for years, and will continue, probably, in the future, except on an occasion like this.

We have the right in granting a patent to grant it upon such terms as we please. The patent is a monopoly, not an actual one but an artificial monopoly. We have the right. I can not understand the theory of gentlemen who propose where a patent now granted in the United States to a German citizen and worked in Germany, and the product can not be brought from Germany into the United States, and the owner of the patent itself can not work it in the United States—I can not understand the theory of gentlemen who oppose granting some one the right under guarded conditions to work that patent in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word as to the matter mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] in connection with what was said by the gentleman from Minnesota in regard to salvarsan.

I want to make a statement that I think ought to be made in addition to what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has said on the subject of salvarsan. I took this matter up, at the instigation of the committee, with the War Department. We have not only the word of the Mayo brothers, but Col. H. C. Fisher, of the War Department, who has this matter in charge, tells me that this institute in Philadelphia, to which the gentleman from Minnesota has called attention, is ready to manufacture salvarsan and furnish it to the Government at a dollar a dose, which is now costing, if manufactured under the old processes, $4.50 to $5 a dose. And not only that, but he says the War Department have experimented with it and tried it, and they have found that in every way it was as efficient as that made under the German patent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman aware that before it was marketed over 50,000 tests were made, and that it would take a year to determine its efficiency?

Mr. SNOOK. I do not know how many tests were made. It is known as "606." The War Department has tested it out fully as prepared by this firm in Philadelphia and have found it efficient in every way.

Mr. WINGO. Is there anything in the suggestion, from the investigation you have made, that it is impossible to compound these chemicals in this country?

Mr. SNOOK. Not at all. We are compounding them, and are ready to do so; and if the bill is passed these people in Philadelphia are ready to take out a license under this bill, so the War Department informs me, and begin furnishing it right away at $1 a dose and soon thereafter as low as 50 cents a dose.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman believe that it is so important that we should take this extreme measure and risk all the patents owned by American citizens in Germany for the sake of salvarsan?

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman talks about something outside the question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the whole thing.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman permit me to read Col. Fisher's exact words? I have them right before me.

Mr. SNOOK. I would be very glad to have the gentleman do that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He says:

The Medical Department of the Army has been obliged to pay $4.50 per dose, compared with $2.50 before the war. It is a fact that the Dermatological Institute in Philadelphia can make this same material, which the institute designates arsenobenzol. This is an entirely satisfactory substitute for salvarsan; and the director of the institute, Dr. Schamberg, informs me it could be sold for $1 a dose or less.

Now will the gentleman permit me to read a statement on the same subject from the Mayo Hospital?

Mr. SNOOK. I shall be very glad to have the gentleman read it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I read:

Arsenobenzol, as prepared under Prof. Schamberg's direction, is identical in composition with and equal in clinical efficiency to original salvarsan (606) of the Ehrlich patents. This has been attested by the studies of the council on pharmacy and chemistry of the American Medical Association. My own impressions and those of other clinicians who have used the drug all seem to agree that its efficiency is the same as that of salvarsan, and that its toxicity and the incidence of unfavorable complications after its use is, if anything, lower than that of the German product. Prof. Schamberg and his collaborators, Drs. Kolmer and Raiziss, have made a thoroughgoing study of the drug from every angle, and there can be no reasonable question that they are in position to furnish this country with a product thoroughly surrounded by all the guaranties demanded in the case of so powerful and potentially dangerous a therapeutic agent.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just one more word.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. SNOOK. Dr. Fisher also tells me that a company that is now operating in Canada and whose agents appeared before the committee are manufacturing a substitute called diarsenol, which has been tested by the Johns Hopkins Institute of Baltimore.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is the remedy mentioned by Dr. Schamberg such that we could not manufacture it without infringing on the foreign patents?

Mr. SNOOK. Well, ordinarily there may be some question about that; but under the terms of this bill there can be no question about it, and these gentlemen are willing to take out a license and manufacture it.

Mr. FESS. Is it in order that this composition may be made?

Mr. SNOOK. It is necessary, and for this reason——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNOOK. There is another necessity for this provision in the bill, and that is this: These people who own the German patents are circularizing the trade and the people who use the remedy and are trying to bring about the impression which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is trying to bring before the minds of the Members of the House—that these other preparations made by other people are not efficient, and therefore the people hesitate to use them. But if they take out a license under this bill they would be protected in every way.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, I understood that since the existence of war has annulled almost all contractual relations between citizens here and citizens in Germany this bill merely makes legal what otherwise would be of no value?

Mr. SNOOK. It makes it legal, and it also protects the German patentee, because it provides for money to be deposited with a custodian for his protection and for the use of his patent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes. I wish to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the clause relating to the Federal Trade Commission, empowering that commission to issue licenses, which would seem to take away the power from the Patent Office. On page 38, subsection (c), it is provided that the citizen may apply to the Federal Trade Commission. It seems to me there ought to be a limitation upon the period of time during which the license shall extend, and all that I can find in the bill pertaining to such a limitation are the words "nonexclusive or exclusive."

Mr. SNOOK. No. There are other provisions in the bill providing for the extent of the license.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How long would be the life of the license?

Mr. SNOOK. It would be issued for the life of the patent, but it is left to the discretion of the department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That might be as long as 17 years?

Mr. SNOOK. It might be that long.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the license of the Federal Trade Commission, authorized in this war-emergency act, taking the place of the patent issued by the Patent Office itself, would run as long as the ordinary patent?

Mr. SNOOK. Not necessarily so, but that is left to the discretion of the commission. In some cases, I would say to the gentleman, probably like the case of the firm that is operating in his city of Philadelphia, the expense in preparing for the manufacture of these remedies is very great, so great that they must be guaranteed that they will get a return for the money they expend.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can understand that in the case of this drug perhaps it would not be well to limit the life of the patent to the period of the war, because the use of the drug will go on after the war.

Mr. SNOOK. That is it, exactly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That being the case, is there any limitation at all upon that patent within the 17 years?

Mr. SNOOK. The time is in the discretion of the commissioner.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where is that found?

Mr. SNOOK. In the last paragraph, I think. I can not point it out just at this moment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is not covered by the words "nonexclusive or exclusive," in line 14, page 38, is it?

Mr. SNOOK. No; there is another provision in the bill limiting the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended one minute. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman for a moment put aside salvarsan while I ask him, as a member of the committee, has any effort been made on the part of the committee to ascertain what rights American citizens have with reference to patents in Germany?

Mr. SNOOK. Certainly; we understand that American citizens have valuable rights in patents in Germany.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the gentleman is ready not only to abrogate a sacred contract which the Government has made with patentees in this country but to sacrifice the rights of Americans having patents in Germany——

Mr. SNOOK. I do not yield for an argument. I say there is no abrogation provided for by this bill. This bill absolutely protects the foreign patentee. It is for his protection. I can not understand the way in which the gentleman looks at it. I can not understand his point of view at all.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman's point of view would disregard American rights in Germany.

Mr. SNOOK. Not at all.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is not the very reverse of that true?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to any amendment of this provision——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman from Connecticut indulge me?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How long a time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HILL. Five minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this pending amendment and all amendments to this section shall conclude in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendments and all amendments to this section conclude in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to any technical amendment, but I am opposed to any serious amendment to the substance of this provision, because I think the provision of the section in relation to patents was written by those who fully understood their business.

When the Payne tariff bill was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means to this House I wrote the working-patents clause, which abrogated patents of other countries in this country where they were not worked here within a certain time. Other Governments were doing the same thing. It passed the House of Representatives, and immediately the Bernstorff-Bacon treaty was negotiated between Germany and the United States, providing that the working of patents in either country was equivalent to working them in both, and my understanding is that is the law now. The working-patents clause was eliminated from the Payne tariff bill.

Some two or three months ago this very question which the gentleman raises in regard to salvarsan and other articles came up, and at my request and at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] the former president of the American Chemical Society wrote to the leading chemists of this country to know whether it was possible, if these patents were abrogated, to manufacture salvarsan and other drugs in this country.

The replies were sent to me. I transmitted them to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. My recollection is that three out of four of the replies that we received, or four out of five—whichever the number was—stated unequivocally that there was no trouble about it except the patents, either in regard to salvarsan or aspirin or other chemicals and other articles. I do not think any question need be raised in regard to it. The answers were conclusive, I think, and were so considered, both by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and myself. Three months ago I was in favor of abrogating these patents as a war measure. I think this provision is a great improvement on that, because it is an attempt on the part of this country to deal honestly with private individuals in Germany. I have no sympathy whatever with the proposition to question Germany's action concerning our patents there. Because Germany may not wish to be honest is no reason why we should not be. This bill in this particular feature deals honestly with our people and with private individuals everywhere. I wish the rest of the bill did the same thing. I hope there will be no amendment to this provision.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has some time remaining. I would like to have him yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HILL. Certainly. I yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call attention to subsection (b):

> Any citizen of the United States, or any corporation organized within the United States, may pay to an enemy or ally of enemy any tax, annuity, or fee which may be required by the laws of such enemy or ally of enemy nation in relation to patents and trade-marks, prints, labels, and copyrights.

If I understand this bill, it shuts off all communication with the enemy or with any ally of the enemy.

Mr. HILL. They may pay, under the terms of this bill, into the Treasury of the United States; and I am going to offer an amendment——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am asking the gentleman now in his time, because I do not want to take up the time of others. Some member of the committee may answer later on. The Secretary of Commerce issues a license in this case, but it is not clear how these payments by citizens of the United States are to be made to aliens during the war.

Mr. HILL. It says that all moneys, including checks and drafts, payable on demand, paid to or received by the alien-property custodian under this act, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States. I think that is sufficient to cover it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How shall these payments to aliens be made—through the Secretary of State or the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. HILL. That is the point I am coming to directly. I think it is covered elsewhere in the bill. I think this is a really good attempt on the part of one out of three or four or more departments of the Government to protect private-property rights of everybody, and to deal honestly with everybody, not only with American citizens but with private citizens in enemy countries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the committee all debate on section 10 has been closed.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 11. That all moneys (including checks and drafts payable on demand) paid to or received by the alien property custodian pursuant to this act shall be deposited forthwith in the Treasury of the United States, and may be invested and reinvested by the Secretary of the Treasury in United States bonds or United States certificates of indebtedness, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, shall prescribe for such deposit, investment, and sale of securities; and as soon after the end of the war as the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem practicable such securities shall be sold and the proceeds deposited in the Treasury.
> All other property of an enemy, or ally of enemy, conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the alien property custodian hereunder shall be safely held and administered by him except as hereinafter provided; and the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to designate as a depositary, or depositaries, of property of an enemy or ally of enemy (under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe) any such bank, or banks, or trust company, or trust companies, located and doing business in the United States, as may be recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. The alien property custodian may deposit with such designated depositary or depositaries, or with the Secretary of the Treasury, any stocks, bonds, notes, time drafts, time bills of exchange, or other securities, or property (except money or checks or drafts payable on demand which are required to be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury), and such depositary or depositaries shall be authorized and empowered to collect any dividends or interest or income that may become due and any maturing obligations held for the account of such custodian. Any moneys collected on said account shall be paid and deposited forthwith by said depositary or by the alien property custodian into the Treasury of the United States as hereinbefore provided.
> The Secretary of Commerce shall require all such designated depositaries to execute and file bonds sufficient in his judgment to protect property on deposit, such bonds to be conditioned as he may direct.
> The alien property custodian shall have power to sell any tangible personal property transferred, assigned, or delivered to him hereunder (not including, however, bonds, stocks, or choses in action) which, in his opinion, is likely to be perishable, and he shall deposit the proceeds thereof forthwith in the Treasury of the United States, as hereinbefore provided.
> After the end of the war any claim of any enemy or of an ally of enemy to any money or other property received and held by the alien property custodian or deposited in the United States Treasury shall be settled as Congress shall direct: Provided, however, That on order of the court, as set forth in sections 9 and 10 hereof, the alien property custodian or the Treasurer of the United States, as the case may be, shall convey, transfer, assign, and pay to the person in whose behalf final judgment or decree shall be entered any property of an enemy or ally of enemy held by said custodian or by said Treasurer, so far as may be necessary to comply with said order of the court: And provided further, That the Treasurer of the United States, on order of the alien property custodian (or such other officer as the President shall direct), shall, as provided in section 10 hereof, repay to the licensee any funds deposited by said licensee.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he has an amendment he wishes to offer? If so, I will withhold mine.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 43, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "with the Secretary of the Treasury" and insert in lieu thereof "in the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. MANN. How are you going to deposit in the Treasury of the United States stocks, bonds, notes, time drafts, time bills of exchange, or other securities?

Mr. MONTAGUE. You can not deposit them with the Secretary of the Treasury. The bill in other places provides that deposits shall be made in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Money is deposited in the Treasury of the United States. If you say "with the Treasury Department," that will be all right. The Treasury of the United States is a place where money is held, and nothing else.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman will observe that it says:

The alien property custodian may deposit with such designated depositary or depositaries, or with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. This is the language of the bill:

The alien property custodian may deposit with such designated depositary or depositaries, or with the Secretary of the Treasury, any stocks, bonds, notes, time drafts, time bills of exchange, or other securities, or property (except money or checks or drafts payable on demand which are required to be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury)—

And so forth.

Now, that is the way it ought to be. You do not deposit them in the Treasury of the United States; you deposit them with the Secretary. When he collects them, that money under the other provisions of the bill may be deposited in the Treasury of the United States or with the Government depositary.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I fell into an error. I think the gentleman is correct, and by unanimous consent I will withdraw the amendment. I had in mind moneys coming into the hands of the Government, which should be covered into the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Virginia any further committee amendments?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have not.

Mr. HILL. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, line 10, after the word "deposited," insert the words "to the credit of the owner"; and in line 15, page 43, after the words "United States," insert the words "to the credit of the owner"; and in line 4, page 44, after the word "shall," insert "on proof of ownership"; in line 4, page 44, strike out the word "settled" and insert in place thereof the word "paid."

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will accept that amendment. I can see no possible harm if it is adopted, and I can see much harm to come from the language of the bill as it now stands. My view in regard to that has been greatly strengthened by a remark made to me a few minutes ago by a Member of the House with regard to the cotton claims in the South. He tells me that from service on the committee he found that during the Civil War the proceeds of some of the captured cotton, to a considerable amount, were deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the owners, and that there had been little or no trouble in the adjustment of these claims and the refunding of that money. But he said there has been a great deal of trouble when the funds were merged with other funds and no distinguishing record kept of them.

The same is true in regard to the French spoliation claims. What I am afraid of is that the sanctity of private property is going to be swept away and destroyed, as it has been in mediæval times in the past, long before The Hague conference declared in favor of it, and that we are going to go into a system of retaliation, the taking of private property of individual owners in the adjustment of lump-sum disagreements of governments after the war is over.

I can see no possible harm to come to anybody from this amendment. We do not want to rob people of their property. We want to be honest with them, and we are the last ones in the world to go into a war for the maintenance of treaty rights because treaty rights have been abrogated by the enemy, and to begin now to set an example for the first time of breaking such treaties.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. What would be the latitude, if any, in the language of the gentleman's amendment "shall be paid as Congress shall direct"? Has Congress any latitude in that direction?

Mr. HILL. Congress has all the latitude in the world. It need not be paid at all after the war is over, as the language now stands. My amendment would make it paid as Congress shall direct. Suppose we put the money all together in the Treasury, and then we say to Germany or Austria we have a lot of claims against your people, and you have a lot of claims against our people, and we will offset ours against yours and allow our citizens to sue us and make their claims against the Treasury of the United States. We did that in the French spoliation claims, and the American people have not got their money yet. The nations of the world agreed that private property should not be confiscated in time of war. Why should we not follow out the agreement made at The Hague Conference?

Mr. FESS. As I understand the gentleman's desire, it is to so secure the private-property owner that the presence of war will not deprive him of any right.

Mr. HILL. Absolutely. We admit the right and powers specified in the bill of the Government to take that money and use it in its own way, to use it for a vigorous prosecution of the war against Germany, which I am in favor of, to invest it and reinvest it; but somewhere, somehow, we should make a declaration that this property of private citizens who, certainly in Germany, no matter whether here or anywhere else, have no power to begin or close this war, shall be held as a sacred trust by somebody to use it in any way we will, but in some way or other and somehow we should declare now that we will pay it back.

I feel just as Robert Ingersoll once said in regard to certain claims when he came before Congress: "For God's sake settle, if you never pay a cent." I want to be honest in the beginning whether we are honest in the end or not.

Mr. FESS. Can the gentleman conceive of a contingency arising where the United States would not want to make good an obligation that a citizen of the United States held to a foreign citizen?

Mr. HILL. It has never been done in the past. It has always been done the other way. Before The Hague Conference said that private property or land should be sacred from confiscation in time of war, the Government has claimed those debts and swapped them; and if a citizen could get it back, well and good. I want to see that stopped. Does the gentleman from Ohio know of a reason why we should not make this declaration now?

Mr. FESS. I do not.

Mr. HILL. If we are going to make it by and by, after the war is over——

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend that I do not; but I was wondering whether there was a contingency possible.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman know of a case in the history of the past——

Mr. FESS. I do not

Mr. HILL. Where this has been done? Let us set a new example to the world of a straightforward declaration of what we intend to do. We were a signatory to The Hague Conference. What if other countries do not agree to it? Should we refuse to pay our private debts because other people do not pay theirs? I hope the committee will accept this amendment.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], in the course of his argument, seemed to intimate that this money paid in to the custodian and by him paid in to the Treasury of the United States will be placed in jeopardy. I have no such fear. When that money is paid in to the custodian and paid in to the depositary, or such other person as the President may direct, an acquittance is given by a Government official to the party paying, indicating that the Government of the United States received on such and such a date such and such an amount of money. That in itself practically impresses the money so received with the character and nature of a trust fund.

There is another feature, and it is the practical side of it, which seems to me to be insurmountable, when you consider that there may be thousands and thousands of these amounts coming in. Under the amendment suggested by the gentleman there must be separate accounts kept of every single item that is paid in to the custodian. It may be $50 by way of interest, $75 by way of dividends on a transaction, and yet this must be segregated, must be kept separate and apart, and a distinct account kept of every one of these items. Why, you would have to have an army of clerks, in my humble judgment, to take care of the business should the amendment of the gentleman prevail.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, just one word in reply. As to the question of accounts, it is a matter, in my judgment, of no importance. We have just issued a loan of $2,000,000,000, and we have from three to four million subscribers to that loan. We have to keep those accounts. The gentleman says that thousands and thousands of these accounts will have to be kept. Why should we not keep an account of the money that we take and keep without paying any interest on, or anything of that kind?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that the Treasury intends to keep a separate account of each individual owning a bond?

Mr. HILL. I think the Treasury has to keep an account with each individual——

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. HILL. Practically. They have to keep it by the number of every bond that they have.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that no separate account is kept with individuals.

Mr. HILL. In the sense in which bookkeeping is done, no; but a register of every single bond is made, whether $50 or $100 or of a $1,000 bond. There is no trouble about that; if there is, we can afford to do that. If we take away a man's money, if we have the use of it during the war without compensation to him, we can afford to do that. If the transaction that we are entering upon is so great, we ought to enter upon it with double care. It has to be kept, anyhow. The gentleman sitting by my side properly suggests that if it is taken by the custodian there will have to be a record made of it. If such a record is not made, how is proof of ownership to be established? It seems to me it is a simple matter. If we are going to adopt a policy of this kind, it is a simple matter to so arrange that the accounts shall be kept properly.

It is simply a record of the receipt of so much money from such and such a person. Then there is no trouble about the proof of the ownership in the end, and that is all there is to this, and I feel that we ought to make a full declaration now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more in order that I may ask him some questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, if we would not pass this act, then the contractual obligation requiring the payment of money back to the creditors would merely be suspended during the pendency of the war?

Mr. HILL. That is right; and the Government would have the use of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. And at the conclusion of the war the creditor could begin suit in our own courts.

Mr. HILL. He could make a claim on the Treasury, if my amendment is adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am assuming if there be no such provision carried in this bill.

Mr. HILL. That is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. As we are invalidating in a way the rights of the alien property owner, why should not we in all fairness guarantee him the payment of the money, because international law does not recognize the abrogation of property rights of citizens of a belligerent; it merely suspends the collection of them.

Mr. HILL. That is all.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will permit?

Mr. HILL. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Is there anything to the accounting more than the keeping of a list?

Mr. HILL. Not a thing.

Mr. TILSON. The making of a catalogue?

Mr. HILL. Simply the keeping of a register of the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course a list will be kept of all money paid into the Treasury of the United States and of all money paid into the depository, a record will be kept of all those things whether the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut prevails or not. His amendment is that the money shall be turned into the Treasury to the credit of the owner. A credit account is a technical expression. It requires the opening of a separate account on the books of the Treasury of the United States. It seems to me that is going to carry a burden entirely unnecessary. It will not add any to the record, and the gentleman's amendment, while it pretends to say that the money in the end shall be paid back to the owners, will not accomplish that purpose, because, under the Constitution of the United States, when money is paid into the Treasury of the United States it can not be paid out without an appropriation by Congress.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not proposing to make an appropriation by Congress. Certainly I will yield.

Mr. HILL. If this money is paid in under the terms of this bill, will it appear in the Treasurer's statement as a debt against the United States?

Mr. MANN. I do not know.

Mr. HILL. I do not think it will.

Mr. MANN. I do not think anyone on this side of the House can predict how any money paid into the Treasury of the United States will appear in the Treasury statement after our recent experience. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I fully agree with the gentleman in regard to that. I want this money paid in so that it may appear on the Treasury statement as a debt of the United States.

Mr. MANN. I assume it will appear as money held in trust by the United States for this purpose. Now, there is no money in the Treasury of the United States, no matter what gentlemen may sometimes say on the floor of the House, which belongs to somebody else. We hear about cotton taxes and various things of that sort. All funds in the United States Treasury which were held for the benefit of individuals growing out of contracts during the war were paid out to those people shortly after the end of the war, and undoubtedly will be done in this case unless it should happen, which I do not think at all likely, that in making the treaty of peace we should make a trade off with the German Government, which I do not think we are likely to do so far as these accounts are concerned. We keep a record and that is all that is necessary.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I beg the attention of the committee. I hope very earnestly that the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut will not prevail. The impracticability of the amendment has been demonstrated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The identity of owners of property coming into the custody of the Government will be well established because of the report and record thereof. We speak of millions and millions that may come into the Treasury, but the bill does not require that all or any of this money shall be carried in the Treasury or impounded by the Government. The mandatory features of the bill are the disclosure, and, secondly, the report of this disclosure. Then arises the question as to whether or not it will be acquired and taken into the Treasury. We have recently had experience in legislation of somewhat similar character. This House debated quite elaborately what should be done with the interned German ships taken over by our Government.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me just a moment? It is mandatory that that money shall be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The mandatory feature is the report of the discovery or disclosure, not that all the money shall be carried into the Treasury. That is not my construction of the act, and it is not, as I understand it, the interpretation of the Department of Justice.

Mr. HILL. It refers to all the money that is collected.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But not all of it is required to be collected.

Mr. HILL. Then the job of taking account of it is very much lessened, and no harm will be done by adopting the amendment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The less that is put in the Treasury the less will have to be accounted for, of course.

Now I wish to call attention to the joint resolution approved by Congress on May 12, 1917. Here a similar question was raised—it was practically analogous—as to what should be done with the value of the ships. The language then adopted was:

> Make a written report of findings to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall preserve such report with the records of his department. These findings shall be considered as competent evidence in all proceedings on any claim for compensation.

That brings us abruptly to this conclusion, namely, it is unquestionably the purpose, and the wise purpose, of this Government—and, in my judgment, the inexorable duty of this Government—to see that this property is so held that it can be available for consideration and disposition when the treaty of peace is entered upon. If we take the property and hold it in trust for each individual, then the question of offsets or cognate questions that may arise in the final negotiations will be immensely curtailed if not forbidden.

I concur with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] in appreciation of the honesty of our Government. I have not the slightest apprehension that we will deal dishonestly. Moreover, in my judgment, the property taken over by the Government, so far as individual claims are concerned, will not only be held by a more solvent stakeholder than if it be left in the hands of the debtor, but it will perhaps thereby be more available for the enemy creditors.

Mr. SNOOK. May I call my colleague's attention to the provision in the British act, providing for the disposition of property held by custodian, similar to that of the bill under consideration? I am reading from the matter put into the RECORD by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. FESS] on page 4871. Section 5 of the British act provides:

> The custodian shall, except so far as the board of trade or the high court or a judge thereof may otherwise direct, and subject to the provisions of the next succeeding subsection, hold any money paid to and any property vested in him under this act until the termination of the present war, and shall thereafter deal with the same in such manner as His Majesty may by order in council direct.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman tell us the substance of the next section, so that we may have a more intelligent discus-standing? It is just like the patent law, in allowing the courts to deal with it.

Mr. SNOOK. The preceding section is this:

The vesting order under this section as respects property of any description shall be of the like purport and effect as the vesting order as respects property of the same description made under the trustee act, 1893.

And the next preceding section is:

The court or judge before making any order under this section may direct that such notice, if any, whether by way of advertisement or otherwise, shall be given as the court or judge may think fit.

Mr. HILL. You read the first quotation in the succeeding section showing how it should be dealt with by the court. Now, this is as to the disposal of your patents. Is it not provided that the court shall dispose of them? This provision provides that the money shall be lost in an indistinguishable fund and go into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SNOOK. I am quoting the provision of the British act, and, let me say to my colleague, the same provision is in the Canadian act.

Mr. HILL. I think it covers substantially what I want to cover in a feeble way. In other words, it places the whole thing in the jurisdiction of the court, and I want to make the declaration now in order to save all trouble.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I want to say a word more.

I have no apprehension as to the honesty and good faith of our Government when this war is over. I am not willing to vote a want of confidence in our Government or in our institutions or in ourselves.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman think that our conduct in the French spoliation claims has been blameworthy?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, I incline to think so; but the trouble about that was that there was a lack of record evidence as to those claims; but in this case the record is kept just as an instance occurs, and that record is preserved.

Mr. HILL. Will not the gentleman admit that the relations of private property to governmental institutions have been wholly changed by the action of the nations of the world in The Hague conference, and that the old actions of the Governments in the past they have been attempting to do away with?

Mr. MONTAGUE. This tribunal undertook to effect some wholesome changes, but that noble institution and its work has been radically changed by the devastation that is now destroying the holy accumulations of years.

Mr. HILL. I admit that; but are we going to be a party to it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; I am not asking to be a party to it, save to prevent its further devastation, especially its spreading to our shores.

Mr. TEMPLE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is it not true that The Hague convention, that the gentleman refers to, specifically provides that it shall not be binding in any way unless all the belligerents in that war are signatory powers?

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman say that that obviates or does away with the morality of the proposition?

Mr. TEMPLE. The contract certainly is not violated when we keep that particular section of it which provides that it shall not be binding under certain circumstances, and those circumstances now exist.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In answer to the gentleman's question, Mr. Chairman, I can only say that he is a far better authority than I am on this matter, but as my memory serves me, he is entirely correct in the statement just made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. I believe that if citizens of the State of Texas, for example, invited citizens of the State of Pennsylvania to make investments in Texas, and those investments were made in good faith, and a state of war should break out between the two States, the property rights of those investors should be preserved. By the same token, if citizens of Germany, in good faith and at a time when we were at peace with Germany, upon invitation from citizens of the United States, made their investments in this country, we should preserve the property we take from them during the existence of a state of war, and hold it so that the ownership might be properly determined at the close of the war. We have the use of their property meanwhile; in fact, we use it temporarily for the benefit of the United States.

It seems to me the gentleman from Connecticut, apart from the technical and legal or international questions raised by others, is morally right, and that it would do no harm to establish a precedent based on honesty, even if there be no international law to sustain it.

Long before the United States entered this war it was actually suggested by certain persons in interest in this country that we should take out of certain warehouses goods deposited there by German merchants and appropriate them to our own use.

As there was no state of war then existing, that proposition at that time seemed to be an immoral proposition. It looked to me little short of highway robbery. It meant to take away from a man property which he had intrusted to us in good faith and which for the time being we had agreed to protect.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. You also heard it advocated by a very prominent citizen of the United States that these foreign ships that were interned here should be seized by the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think they were seized.

Mr. GORDON. Before the declaration of war?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; after the declaration; but it was proposed that we take them over and appropriate them to ourselves before the declaration of war.

Mr. GORDON. Certainly——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When we had no legal or international right to do so. That was not the real American spirit. We should preserve our own morale, even though we are at war with Germany. If an American citizen was doing business in good faith with Germany before the war and has property over there at the present time, I presume we would expect Germany to hold it so that the American citizen at the conclusion of the war at least could put in a plea and recover it. That is what the Hill amendment means, if I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 43, line 1, after the word "companies," insert "or in the case of tangible personal property, other suitable depositary or depositaries."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides that the alien-property custodian shall have intrusted to him not only intangible personal property but also tangible personal property. At the bottom of page 42 is the provision that he may, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, deposit the property intrusted to him in any bank or banks or in any trust company or trust companies.

The bill clearly contemplates that he will have in his hands, and will have to dispose in some suitable way of, tangible personal property also. A bank or trust company is obviously not a natural place for the deposit of tangible personal property. In proposing this amendment I am simply seeking to give effect to the clear intent of the law by allowing the Secretary of Commerce to designate other suitable depositaries in the case of tangible personal property.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is an honored member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and during this debate has shown considerable information about matters contained in this bill. I would like to inquire, because it has not been brought forth so far in the debate, as to the extent of property that may be taken over by the Government under the authority of this act, owned by German citizens living abroad and invested in this country.

Mr. ROGERS. I can not give the gentleman any detailed information on that subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield the floor?

Mr. ROGERS. My amendment is to be disposed of first, I take it.

Mr STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to engage the attention of the gentleman having this bill in charge as to whether he can furnish the committee with any estimate of the amount of money that is to be taken over under the provisions of this act—the amount or value of property owned by German citizens living abroad and invested in this country?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no way of giving any accurate answer to that inquiry. It was propounded in the committee. The amount may be very large, but, of course, there can be no accurate approximation at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose that when this bill is enacted it will provoke upon the part of Germany a similar bill authorizing the German Government to take over the property of American citizens invested in Germany. Can the gentleman furnish us any estimate of the amount of American capital invested in Germany by such concerns as the International Harvester Co., the Standard Oil Co., and other concerns which have large investments in Germany?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I can not inform the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Am I rightly informed that Germany up to the present time has taken no action whatever toward trying to take possession of property invested by American citizens in Germany?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no information on that point. I imagine that information relating to such matters is quite hermetically sealed by Germany.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will ask the gentleman whether it has been claimed by representatives of the State Department that any such action has been taken by Germany?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not know. I have made no inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MANN. Surely the gentleman is not opposed to it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask for a division.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask for a division. There is a misapprehension about this. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes none.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 42, lines 26 and 27, after the word "regulations," in line 26, strike out the words "he may prescribe" and insert the words "may be approved by the President."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the committee accepted a similar amendment in a preceding paragraph, and unless this amendment is accepted at this point section 11 will be anomalous in that the Secretary of the Treasury is required——

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is all right. It will preserve the uniformity of the provisions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is a highly technical amendment, and hence it may be considered from a highly technical standpoint. As the amendment was read, it proposed to insert, after the word "regulations"——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It should be after the word "as."

Mr. MANN. That makes a material difference, speaking from a technical standpoint.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the technical objection is withdrawn I will ask to insert the word "as."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 42, lines 26 and 27, after the words "regulations as," in line 26, strike out the words "he may prescribe" and insert the words "may be approved by the President."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. We passed over a paragraph on page 34.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; I am coming to that. First we passed over a paragraph on page 29, with the understanding that we would recur to it again. I desire to submit the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 29, line 2, after the word "enemy," insert a comma and the words "and he may revoke or review such suspension from time to time."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that this section merely gives to the President and the Secretary of Commerce the right to grant licenses, so far as trading with allies of the enemy is concerned, or would the President under any circumstances have the right to grant licenses, so far as trading with the enemy as defined by this act is concerned?

Mr. MONTAGUE. To any person or any class of persons, it does not make any difference who they are; but that is not the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I am asking the effect of this section, whether it is limited to allies of the enemy or whether it is applicable also to enemy subjects.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is applicable to enemy subjects also.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not see where there is any reference to that in the bill.

Mr. MANN. That is one reason why it was passed over. That is to come later.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman propose to offer an amendment to cover that?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was not aware of that, or I would not have asked the question.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, referring to section 15, does not the gentleman think that the word "willfully" should appear before the word "violate," in line 19, page 46? It says:

That whoever shall violate this act.

The violation may be entirely unintentional. Of course, if it be intentional, it should be punished. I make the suggestion that the word "willfully" ought to be inserted.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is a committee amendment pending. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 29, lines 3 and 4, after the word "licenses," strike out the words "under this act," and at the end of the line, after the word "person," insert the words "to perform any act made unlawful in section 3 of this act without such license."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 15 to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to section 15 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Now, on page 46, line 19, before the word "violate," I move to insert the word "willfully."

Page 46, line 19, after the word "shall," insert the word "willfully."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 13, after the word "commerce," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

"Provided further, That the definition of 'enemy' in this subdivision shall not include any person outside of the United States residing outside of the territory of any nation or ally of any nation with which the United States is at war, in so far as such person does business with neutrals, allies of the United States, or with the Government or people of the United States, and such business is not connected, directly or indirectly, with any business done by such person within the territory of any nation or ally of any nation with which the United States is at war."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, line 9, after the word "territory," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

"Provided, That the definition of 'ally of enemy' in this subdivision shall not include any person outside the United States residing outside the territory of any nation or ally of any nation with which the United States is at war, in so far as such person does business with neutrals, allies of the United States, or with the Government or people of the United States, and such business is not connected, directly or indirectly, with any business done by such person within the territory of any nation or ally of any nation with which the United States is at war.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman withhold that motion until I offer an amendment?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Reserving the right to object, let us hear what the amendment is.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 13, after the word "commerce," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following words "and approved by the President."

Mr. MANN. Did not we agree to an amendment of that kind offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. At another place.

Mr. MANN. No; at this particular place, and the Clerk has it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman that this amendment was not introduced at that point, and it simply makes uniform the various provisions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it will require unanimous consent to return to this section.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not object.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, was not an amendment offered to that very place by the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My amendment follows the word "regulation," preceding the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman submit a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to return to the section indicated for the purpose of offering an amendment that has been read at the Clerk's desk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania:
Page 24, to follow the amendment just adopted offered by Mr. LENROOT——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; to follow the word "commerce" preceding the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the Clerk informs the Chair that a similar amendment has been adopted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If such an amendment has been adopted, I withdraw mine.

The CHAIRMAN. It was offered by the committee and adopted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4960) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONTAGUE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise the remarks which I made in my opening address upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL FRIDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Friday next. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think it would be well if the gentleman from North Carolina would inform the House of the probable program for the next week or two.

Mr. KITCHIN. The aviation bill will be reported on Friday next, and it will be taken up Saturday. I understand that it will be easily passed upon that day. Then we hope to have a gentlemen's agreement for adjournments three days at a time, as we did last week, until Monday, July 23.

Mr. MANN. It is not expected, then, that the conference report upon the first food bill will be in before the 23d of July?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think it will. I think they are waiting on the other.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, there are various estimates pending before the Committee on Appropriations. No hearings have yet been had upon them, and I do not know how soon the committee may be prepared to present a bill to the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee would have hearings probably next week, and would be able to present a bill on the week following.

Mr. SHERLEY. I just wanted the House to have in mind that there is that legislation ahead of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Friday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] have leave to address the House for one hour on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that on Friday next, after the reading of the Journal and the transaction of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] be permitted to address the House for not to exceed one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 or 30 minutes on Friday next, after Mr. ROGERS, of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks leave to address the House, not to exceed 30 minutes, on next Friday, after the speech of Mr. ROGERS——

Mr. MADDEN. On the subject of food regulation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 37 minutes), under its previous order, the House adjourned to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Friday, July 13, 1917.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting draft of a bill to provide rates of duty on merchandise imported into the Virgin Islands of the United States and for the administration of customs in those islands (H. Doc. No. 254); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting draft of a bill to provide for the reimbursement of officers, enlisted men, and others in the naval service of the United States for property lost or destroyed in such service (H. Doc. No. 255); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. RAKER, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3132) to amend section 2171 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to naturalization, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 92), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 12, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that Thou hast enabled us to unite in the maintenance of spiritual ideals, that we have been enabled to demonstrate to the world that we are inspired not by the material but by the spiritual. We thank Thee for the unity of effort of Thy people in this great land, and for our ability to follow those great lines of human conduct that have their birth in the revelations of Thy will to men. We pray Thee to look upon us with Thy fatherly care and love this day. Fill us more and more with the unity of spirit and purpose which comes out of the ministries of Thy grace. Give to us success in our enterprises. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, July 9, 1917, when, on request of Mr. JAMES and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

RECENT DISTURBANCES IN EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was waited upon by a delegation of citizens this morning who presented a memorial to the Senate of the United States. It has to do with the recent loss of life and destruction of property in the State of Illinois.

These citizens are of colored birth, and headed by Rev. Dr. Waldron, of this city, breathed such a spirit of loyalty and devotion to the Republic that the Chair instructs that the petitions be inserted in full in the RECORD and that they be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Chair thinks that is the appropriate place for the petitions to go.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1917.

To the Senate of the United States,
Vice President THOMAS R. MARSHALL, President:

Your petitioners, citizens of the United States and residents of Maryland, Virginia, District of Columbia, Pennsylvania, and other States, respectfully represent that the Constitution of the United States guarantees to every American citizen the safety of life, liberty, property, and equal protection of the laws; and that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States; and that the people of the United States shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures; and that no person in the United States shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in land or naval forces or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or in public danger; and that every American citizen before being condemned or executed shall be entitled to a fair and impartial trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. Your petitioners respectfully represent to you that the above-mentioned provisions of the Constitution of the United States have been flagrantly violated by several of the States of the United States, notably Tennessee in its recent lynchings and burning of American citizens at Memphis, and Illinois in its more recent wholesale lynchings, murders, and burnings of citizens of the United States at East St. Louis; and your petitioners request that the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives appoint at once a joint commission empowered, authorized, and instructed to investigate thoroughly and well the violations of the United States Constitution referred to above and to discover their causes and the reasons why the authorities of the State of Tennessee and the city of Memphis, and the authorities of the State of Illinois and the city of East St. Louis failed to enforce the constitutions of their States and the Constitution of the United States, and to ascertain whether Tennessee and Illinois are in the possession of a republican form of government.

Your petitioners are of the opinion that the outrages committed upon colored American citizens in East St. Louis, Ill., are a part of a deep-laid conspiracy by the enemies of the United States to promote strife, bloodshed, and revolution in the many communities North and West into which colored American citizens from the South have recently settled in large numbers, in order to make it impossible for our country to send to Europe the men, material, and munitions necessary to subdue Germany and her allies. By reason of the strong race prejudice and the animosity of foreign and organized labor against the colored people which prevail in the northern and western communities to which colored American citizens have recently migrated in large numbers, it is comparatively easy for the foes of our country to arouse these said communities to deeds of violence, murder, and conflagration. For these reasons we appeal to the honorable Senate of the United States to exercise the power vested in her by the Constitution and enact immediately such legislation that will prevent the recurrence of such crimes as were committed in Memphis, Tenn., and in East St. Louis, Ill., recently.

And we will ever pray, etc.

The Committee of 100 Colored Citizens on the War, J. Milton Waldron, president; Chas. M. Thomas, secretary; and delegates from religious, civic, and business organizations of colored citizens in Maryland, Virginia, District of Columbia, Pennsylvania, and other States, William Pickens (Maryland delegation), chairman, Jennie H. Ross (Maryland), clerk.

JULY 12, 1917.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

More persons have suffered death by mob violence than were killed in the Spanish-American War.

Just about ten times as many Americans have lost their lives by mobs—in violation of the law—as have become victims of German submarines.

According to the records, which have been kept consecutively since 1885, 3,373 American citizens have been hanged, burned, or otherwise unlawfully done to death. This large number of men and women have not found democracy in our country safe, and have been lynched without warning.

This last outbreak in East St. Louis came on the eve of the Fourth of July celebration, and at a time when to our positive knowledge colored Americans were in hearty accord with the President in this war crisis, standing ready and willing to do service in any capacity.

Thirty-seven persons are thus known to have lost their lives, not strike breakers only but old men, women, and children. Alleged causes of the riot conflict. This much is certain: It began as a labor disturbance, and ended as a race riot.

Two points stand out clearly:

1. The local police were unable to handle the situation.
2. The State militia disarmed the blacks and provided arms and ammunition for the whites.

The lynching records show that every mob that has committed violence has been strong enough to prevent conviction of its members in the local courts. So long as the Federal Government stands aloof mob law may feel encouraged, not discouraged.

The citizens of Baltimore urge the President and Members of Congress to act immediately upon the Dyer resolution (known as H. J. Res. 118), which urges—

The appointment of a congressional committee to study and report upon the riot in East St. Louis.

The discovery of what laws, if any, are needed to prevent like occurrences in Illinois or any other State.

WM. PICKENS,
Mrs. JENNIE H. ROSS,
BESSIE COLEMAN,
JUNIEL GRAY,
CARL J. MURPHY, Editor Afro-American,
Committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4960) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial of Frederick Stearns & Co., of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against a tax being placed on gross sales, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the General Synod of the Reformed Church in America in session at Asbury Park, N. J., favoring national prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MYERS. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana for the submission of a constitutional amendment for national prohibition. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 5.

Memorial to Congress of the United States to pass an amendment to the Federal Constitution and submit the same to the several States for ratification prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for use as a beverage.

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the members of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate and house concurring, respectfully represent:

Whereas it appears that a majority of the people of the United States are in favor of prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for use as a beverage; and

Whereas there is now pending before Congress of the United States a measure proposing an amendment to the Federal Constitution designed to effect such prohibition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That we, the members of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, do hereby petition and earnestly pray the Congress of the United States that such measure proposing an amendment to the Federal Constitution so prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors be passed and submitted to the several States for ratification; and

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of Montana to the Senate and to the House of Representatives of the United States, and that copies hereof be transmitted by the secretary of state of Montana to the Senators and Representatives of Montana in Congress.

JAS. F. O'CONNOR,
Speaker of the House.
W. W. MCDOWELL,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 13, 1917.

S. V. STEWART, Governor.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of Butte Local No. 1, Socialist Party of the United States, of Butte, Mont., praying for the submission of the selective-draft law to a vote of the people, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Yellowstone Association of Congregational Churches, of Montana, praying for national prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of the congregations of the Highland Park Presbyterian Church, of Minneapolis, of the Christian Endeavor Society of Minneapolis, of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Fosston, of sundry citizens of St. Paul, and of the combined congregations of the churches of Hutchinson, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of the Woman's Missionary Societies of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Winnsboro, and of the Bonham Street Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Paris, in the State of Texas, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ASHURST. I present a petition signed by a number of citizens of Miami, Ariz., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIAMI, ARIZ., July 6, 1917.

Hon. HENRY ASHURST,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, take this means of expressing to you our earnest desire that you give your unremitting support to the Chamberlain bill for universal military training.

Yours, truly,
C. E. ARNOLD
(And others).

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a petition of certain citizens of Englevale, N. Dak., and that one of the names be printed with the petition.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENGLEVALE, N. DAK.

United States Senate,
Care of Mr. GRONNA:

The undersigned urge conservation of foodstuffs used in making intoxicating beverages and passage of all prohibition measures, also urge that no added tax be placed on liquors.

Mrs. W. W. ANDERSON
(And 38 others).

POEM BY ALBERT T. LEHMANN.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a song poem written by Albert T. Lehmann, entitled "Hurrah for the U. S. A.!" It is a beautiful and patriotic poem, and I am sure that it will be an inspiration to those who may read it. Mr. Lehmann is a young man living in the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HURRAH FOR THE U. S. A.!

In days gone by, Old Glory, boys,
Has always won the day;
She's fought for freedom's right, boys,
In the good old U. S. A.

CHORUS.

Hurrah! Hurrah! Fall in, boys;
Hurrah for the U. S. A.!
She's going in to win, boys,
The world's democracy.
When we'll see Old Glory waving
In the midst of the densest fray
Then we'll shout with all our might, boys,
"Hurrah for the U. S. A.!"

Our fathers fought and died, boys,
To win democracy;
Like them we'll gladly die, boys,
For a free humanity.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, to report it without amendment. I give notice that I will submit a report to accompany the bill at a later day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

MILITARY SERVICE ACTS OF GREAT BRITAIN (S. DOC. NO. 62).

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. From the Committee on Printing I report a resolution providing for the printing of the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on Tribunals and Certificates of Exemption Under the Military Service Acts of Great Britain. The estimated cost is about $87. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 102) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on May 18, 1917, entitled "Tribunals and Certificates of Exemption Under the Military Service Acts of Great Britain," be printed as a Senate document.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 2632) for the relief of Charles Leon, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 2633) to reinstate John K. Thompson as a gunner in the United States Navy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 2634) to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near the United States Naval Hospital in Bent County, Colo., so as to facilitate the transportation of supplies to said hospital.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The bill relates to the naval hospital. I thought at first it should go to the Committee on Appropriations, but on reflection I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the bill provide for a bridge over a navigable river?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; it is not over a navigable stream; it is over a nonnavigable stream, and is to be constructed for taking supplies to the naval hospital. The hospital is under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department, and it is for the use of the Navy that the bill is introduced. On that account it seems that the Committee on Naval Affairs would be the proper committee to which it should be referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is not to authorize the construction of a bridge; it makes an appropriation for that purpose, but it will go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the bill provides for an appropriation it ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no objection. I first marked it to go to the Committee on Appropriations, and then thought that being for the use of the naval hospital it should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being an appropriation for naval affairs, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 2635) granting a pension to Nelson E. Bucknam;

A bill (S. 2636) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Hargrave;

A bill (S. 2637) granting a pension to John D. Harkless; and

A bill (S. 2638) granting a pension to William G. Neeley; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of New Mexico:

A bill (S. 2639) to amend the act approved June 12, 1917, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Appropriations.

A bill (S. 2640) for the relief of Sara H. Mitchell; and

A bill (S. 2641) granting to the State of New Mexico 300,000 acres of land in said State for the use and benefit of the military institutions of New Mexico; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2642) for the relief of Nicolas Gallegos; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 2643) authorizing the appointment of Morten R. Brock as a captain in the United States Army, and providing for his retirement; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2644) granting a pension to W. H. Johnston; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 2645) providing for the issuance of a special Red Cross stamp and fixing a rate for the transmission of first-class mail matter by the American Red Cross, its chapters, and the auxiliaries thereof; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (S. 2646) for the relief of Edward W. Whitaker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS (H. R. 4285).

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

THE COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. JAMES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 103), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents or any subcommittee thereof be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the foregoing resolution, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

PRICES OF COAL.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have read a letter which I have received bearing on matters under consideration. It is brief, and I think it is important.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

BUILDING OWNERS AND MANAGERS ASSOCIATION,
Cincinnati, Ohio, July 3, 1917.

Chairman COMMERCE COMMITTEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As secretary of the Building Owners and Managers Association of Cincinnati, I have been instructed to address you in behalf of the members of our association, and ask you to further consider the price of coal at the mines.

Our association considers the price of $3 or $3.50 per ton for coal at the mines exorbitant. One year ago we were buying coal at 90 cents per ton at the mines. Labor and other conditions have not advanced sufficiently enough to charge anything near these prices.

A little investigation as to the cost and profit for operating coal at the mines will readily place before you the right figures to be charged, which will not be anything like $3 and $3.50.

Our association stands ready to cooperate with you in every way possible.

Respectfully, yours, M. W. MCINTYRE, Secretary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a communication from the Independent Harvester Co., of Plano, Ill., on the price of bituminous coal. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE INDEPENDENT HARVESTER CO. (Inc.),
Plano, Ill., July 9, 1917.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We have been recently reading of some activity on the part of the Government in an attempt to control or regulate the price of bituminous coal to the consumer, and it occurs to me that our experience of the past 60 days might prove interesting.

We have been endeavoring to contract for our coal requirements for the coming year, but so far without success. Last year we contracted for 2,500 tons at a price of $1.35 per ton at the mines. Of the 2,500 tons we consumed 96 per cent, which I believe is strong evidence that we did not overestimate our needs or store the coal. This year we require approximately the same quantity as last year and July 5 were quoted a price of $3.50 per ton at the mines, and further informed on July 6 that there undoubtedly would be no further reduction during the year from the price quoted. The quotation of $3.50 submitted July 5 was the price we were paying during May and June, or before the recent agitation and conference, and it would seem that in spite of the discussion and widely heralded reduction in price the tangible results do not justify the statement that coal will cost the consumer less.

Trusting the above may prove interesting to you, I am,

Very truly, yours,

W. D. STEWARD.

DEMOCRACIES AGAINST AUTOCRACIES.

Mr. FLETCHER. I submit a paper prepared by Mr. David Lubin, delegate of the United States International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, on the subject of Democracies against Autocracies. I ask to have it referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

PROFITS ON WHEAT.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have here an article taken from the New York Journal of Commerce of July 9, written by Mr. J. J. Slechta, a frequent contributor to that paper on economic and commercial subjects. The article relates to the claim that $250,000,000 were made in profits by wheat merchants during the last few months. Mr. Slechta discusses that question in this article, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEES NO EXTREMELY HIGH CROP PRICES—J. J. SLECHTA TELLS OF THE 1916 WHEAT AND FLOUR PRODUCTION—DECLARES THAT TO HAVE MADE A PROFIT OF $250,000,000, AS ALLEGED IN RECENT CHARGES, WHEAT MERCHANTS AND MILLERS MUST HAVE NECESSARILY CLEARED ABOUT A DOLLAR PER BUSHEL—GIVES STATISTICS TO REFUTE CLAIMS.

EDITOR OF THE JOURNAL OF COMMERCE:

Discussions and various recommendations concerning the necessity for food control have operated to obscure some of the most salient facts relating to the production, distribution, and consumption of American wheat and flour. It has been alleged in press organs, without indication of serious effort to consider the fundamental facts, that the American people have paid a profit of $250,000,000 during the last five months of the crop year (February-June) in the excess of flour cost to consumer over the price received for the wheat by the farmer producing it. Merely in the interest of accuracy I have compiled some statistics the consideration of which is indispensable if an impartial inquiry into the accuracy of such a statement as above mentioned is to be made.

The agricultural reports of the Crop Bureau have placed the 1916 wheat crop of the United States at about 640,000,000 bushels. A profit of $250,000,000 would amount to slightly over 40 cents per bushel on the whole crop, whereas fully 60 per cent of the crop had already been exported or sold for consumption, if not already consumed. A careful tabulation of the figures for the movement of grain at primary points by months during the past 10 years shows conclusively that approximately 60 per cent of every wheat crop leaves the farmers' hands during the first six months of the crop year. On February 1, 1916, certainly not more than 250,000,000 bushels of the 1916 crop remained unsold to consumers. To have resulted in a profit of $250,000,000 wheat merchants and millers must have necessarily cleared about a dollar per bushel. Let us examine the facts so far as they bear upon this question. It should not be difficult to show the source of so unusual a profit, if it existed.

It has also been stated that the average price received by the farmer for the 1916 crop did not exceed $1.50 per bushel. This statement I am not prepared to dispute, but that it should be taken as the measure of the farmer's remuneration, in contradistinction to the highest market price in New York and Chicago, at a time when conditions closely resembling an absolute corner were brought about by the excessive buying of options on futures by the European Government buyers, is hardly short of ridiculous. This will be clear to anyone who cares to consider carefully the following figures:

I do not believe that a great deal of confidence can be placed in the Government's reports of farm wheat prices. These figures must, by the very nature of things, be more or less rough estimates. It is manifestly impossible for any bureau to get an accurate estimate of the actual average price which the farmer receives for his wheat on a given day. The price varies in almost every primary market in every wheat-producing State in the Union. It is very doubtful whether the farmer received a price as high as that indicated in the Government reports, but, on the other hand, it is certainly true that a not inconsiderable portion of the crop was marketed at prices very close to the cash prices. This is particularly true of wheat in the soft winter sections, which is sold in a larger proportion direct to the millers, or at least for immediate local consumption. The writer knows of instances where mills have purchased wheat for cash at prices which were actually higher than the cash prices on the Chicago market.

But taking the Government's figure at their face value, let us analyze them in comparison with market prices. Take the price on July 1—92.9 cents per bushel. It must be obvious even to the man on the street, who knows anything at all about the machinery of modern American business, that this price of 92.9 cents was determined largely by the quotations in the large distributing markets, such as Chicago, Minneapolis, Omaha, or Toledo. On that same day the price of No. 2 hard winter was $1.04, delivered on the tracks. Bear in mind that the average of the crop is not equal in quality to No. 2 hard, or anywhere near it. Prices at this period of the crop year were steadily mounting, yet the largest profit which might have been realized was 12 cents per bushel, from which must be deducted the cost of handling several times, rail freight, insurance, shrinkage in weight, etc. Note the comparison with flour prices. A barrel of flour sold in New York at $5.33, requiring 4⅓ bushels of wheat, represents a value in wheat of about $1.20 per bushel. Probably the average price paid by millers for wheat bought and delivered in July did not much exceed the price on July 1, $1.04, which indicates a comfortable margin of profit. But the universal milling practice is to sell options against wheat stock bought for milling to avoid risk of a fall in price; hence, the profit realized by increased price for flour is offset by loss on sale of option. The profit was probably realized by the speculator or by the purchaser for export, who bought in the miller's options to provide cargoes for future shipment.

Confused thinking on matters of this kind results inevitably from inability to visualize exactly what happens in a given transaction. I was much interested in Senator REED'S effort, during the examination of Mr. Hoover before the committee, to get such a visualization of a certain farmer's crop of a thousand bushels, sold to an elevator at Fargo, N. Dak. So far as could be learned from the report of the hearing, that thousand bushels was lost in transit. Let us see what actually does happen to a similar thousand bushels.

The farmer probably gets a postcard bid from one or more elevators, or he may call up on the rural telephone. Let us suppose that he has his first thrashing ready on September 1. The Fargo elevator offers him $1.31 per bushel and he sends in his wagons. Some of it he may deliver at once, but he has sold it all and may not deliver it for two weeks. The elevator is in touch by wire with Minneapolis. If he is a close and careful trader, he is sure to sell each day as much as he has contracted for with farmers, to be delivered on board cars within a specified date. He cleans it, weighs it a second time, grades it, and puts it into freight cars. He may succeed in keeping as much as a cent and a half a bushel after paying his expenses. If he takes chances on a rising market he may make more, but more probably the elevator man takes no chances when wheat is $1 a bushel, and is lucky if he can turn over the season's crop at a net profit of a half cent per bushel. The man who bought the 1,000 bushels from the country elevator is probably a wheat commission dealer, acting for a big Minneapolis miller or for a wheat buyer in Chicago. He has orders to buy at a maximum price given him. Probably a quarter of a cent per bushel is his reward. The commission man's principal miller or wheat merchant is now in legal possession of the 1,000 bushels of wheat, though it has not yet left the farm near Fargo.

At this stage of the proceedings, during which it may be that not over 24 hours have elapsed from the time the farmer agreed on a price with the country elevator until the same identical wheat is sold either to the miller or to a wheat merchant at a central market, the next series of transfers is entered upon in the course of getting the wheat to the consumer. If a miller of flour is the purchaser, the price which he has paid forms the basis upon which he fixes his price of flour. Perhaps the farmer's 1,000 bushels is part of a month's requirements, which the miller now offers for sale for delivery from 30 to 90 days later. These transactions follow each other so closely that thus far, even in a market with the price rising abruptly, there is little opportunity for any party to any one transaction to abstract more than a nominal profit. In fact, the more uncertainty there is in market indications the greater is the promptness with which each transfer takes place. If the miller sells the product of the 1,000 bushels of wheat to an exporter, there appears the widest variation in the amount of profit possible. If the exporter is doing a straight commission business, his margin is always the same, but if he act as exporting merchant his risks necessitate taking all the profit he can get. Should the mill sell for domestic consumption, sale may be made either direct to bakers in consuming centers, through its own representative, or to flour merchants or middlemen. Contrary to common belief, the flour dealer has little opportunity for speculation. Only a very small minority of such merchants have storage facilities for flour. They sell, in most cases, ex cars. They base their sale prices on the price of the miller, and if the baker is not too close a buyer they may extract as much as 50 cents per barrel, or they may get only 10 cents per barrel. If the market price has slumped in the meantime, they run a very large risk of having the flour rejected upon arrival and sell it at a loss. Probably it is fair to say that the retailer, either large or small, has the best opportunity to make large profits when the prices are consistently rising. He has no opportunity to make hedge sales, as he sells only in small quantities. The rule which the retailer invariably follows is to fix a price based on what it costs him to replace his stock, and it must be admitted that year in and year out this is the only safe and business-like course to pursue.

Comparison will show that the farm price is never long in narrowing the margin which may appear when cash prices at leading markets take a sudden rise. Very frequently a considerable disparity in prices is due to purely physical conditions, as, for example, the unparalleled railroad congestion made it all but impossible to move grain promptly at the end of 1916. Wheat was much less valuable on the farm than at a point of consumption, as is indicated in the prices.

Special attention is called to the option prices, for the reason that millers, being inclined to make prices on flour on a basis which will enable them to replace the wheat already milled, naturally base their calculations on the option market. It will be noted that the options on nearby futures of wheat deliveries invariably follow the farm values much more closely than do cash quotations. An exception is indicated in the figures for June 1, when the closing of the option markets on new trading made futures merely nominal.

If we now compare the foregoing table of prices with the actual record of wheat deliveries at the 11 principal river and lake ports, which must be taken as a fair guide to the movement of the crop from the farms, it will be seen how impossible of verification are the assertions made concerning excessive profits to grain merchants and flour millers:

Monthly arrivals at 11 principal western points (approximate.)

1916.	Bushels.
July	28,730,000
August	48,475,000
September	52,000,000
October	42,000,000
November	40,000,000
December	45,000,000
1917
January	21,000,000
February	23,000,000
March	20,000,000
April	26,000,000
May	22,000,000
June (estimated)	15,000,000

Arrivals at these 11 ports account for 60 per cent of the entire crop, and must be fairly indicative of the entire crop movement. Note that two-thirds of the deliveries were made in the first six months of the crop year. Nevertheless, according to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, there was still 15.8 per cent of the crop in farmers' hands on March 1, after which the highest farm prices were paid. The significance of the comparatively heavy arrivals after March 31, when the prices first touched the $2 mark, should also be noted.

It is not my purpose to dispute any statement to the effect that prices to the consumer could be reduced by a socialization of the wheat and flour merchandising, but it would seem that the figures herewith quoted are ample refutation of the extreme statements accredited to Mr. Hoover and others, regarding the amount of the return to the producer, as compared to the price paid by the consumer. What the result would be upon production and upon distributive factors in the course of a season or two, should the laws of supply and demand be wholly eliminated from the process which determines prices, and ipso facto, the amount of production, is a wholly different matter, not within the scope of this article.

JOSEPH J. SLECHTA.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Every true American must have been delighted this morning when he read the powerful call by the President to the business interest to substitute patriotism for profits. His language is so clear and so thrilling, so expressive of the great burden which he carries, and yet so inspiring to others to carry their share, I believe the response he has a right to expect will be made to the call.

The call of the President is not alone to the business interests; it is an appeal to every man to stand by the President's side and do his part. I wish that the appeal should have the most general circulation, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the President's address was ordered to be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

"My fellow countrymen, the Government is about to attempt to determine the prices at which it will ask you henceforth to furnish various supplies which are necessary for the prosecution of the war and various materials which will be needed in the industries by which the war must be sustained.

"We shall, of course, try to determine them justly and to the best advantage of the Nation as a whole; but justice is easier to speak of than to arrive at, and there are some considerations which I hope we shall all keep steadily in mind while this particular problem of justice is being worked out. I therefore take the liberty of stating very candidly my own view of the situation and of the principles which should guide both the Government and mine owners and manufacturers of the country in this difficult matter.

"A just price must, of course, be paid for everything the Government buys. By a just price I mean a price which will sustain the industries concerned in a high state of efficiency, provide a living for those who conduct them, enable them to pay good wages, and make possible expansions of their enterprises which will from time to time become necessary as the stupendous undertakings of this great war develop.

"We could not wisely or reasonably do less than pay such prices. They are necessary for the maintenance and development of industry; and the maintenance and development of industry are necessary for the great task we have in hand. But I trust that we shall not surround the matter with a mist of sentiment. Facts are our masters now. We ought not to put the acceptance of such prices on the ground of patriotism.

"Patriotism has nothing to do with profits in a case like this. Patriotism and profits ought never in the present circumstances to be mentioned together.

"It is perfectly proper to discuss profits as a matter of business, with a view to maintaining the integrity of capital and the efficiency of labor in these tragical months when the liberty of free men everywhere and of industry itself trembles in the balance; but it would be absurd to discuss them as a motive for helping to serve and save our country. Patriotism leaves profits out of the question.

"In these days of our supreme trial, when we are sending hundreds of thousands of our young men across the seas to serve a great cause, no true man who stays behind to work for them and sustain them by his labor will ask himself what he is personally going to make out of that labor.

"No true patriot will permit himself to take toll of their heroism in money or seek to grow rich by the shedding of their blood. He will give as freely and with as unstinted self-sacrifice as they. When they are giving their lives will he not give at least his money?

"I hear it insisted that more than a just price, more than a price that will sustain our industries, must be paid; that it is necessary to pay very liberal and unusual profits in order to 'stimulate' production; that nothing but pecuniary rewards will do it—rewards paid in money, not in the mere liberation of the world.

"I take it for granted that those who argue thus do not stop to think what that means. Do they mean that you must be paid, must be bribed, to make your contribution, a contribution that costs you neither a drop of blood nor a tear, when the whole world is in travail and men everywhere depend upon and call to you to bring them out of bondage and make the world a fit place to live in again, amidst peace and justice?

"Do they mean that you will exact a price, drive a bargain, with the men who are enduring the agony of this war on the battle field, in the trenches, amidst the lurking dangers of the sea, or with the bereaved women and the pitiful children, before you will come forward to do your duty and give some part of your life, in easy, peaceful fashion, for the things we are fighting for, the things we have pledged our fortunes, our lives, our sacred honor to vindicate and defend—liberty and justice and fair dealing and the peace of nations? Of course you will not.

"It is inconceivable. Your patriotism is of the same self-denying stuff as the patriotism of the men dead or maimed on the fields of France, or else it is no patriotism at all.

"Let us never speak, then, of profits and of patriotism in the same sentence, but face facts and meet them.

"Let us do sound business, but not in the midst of a mist. Many a grievous burden of taxation will be laid on this Nation, in this generation and in the next, to pay for this war. Let us see to it that for every dollar that is taken from the people's pockets it shall be possible to obtain a dollar's worth of the sound stuffs they need.

"Let me turn for a moment to the shipowners of the United States, and the other ocean carriers whose example they have followed, and ask them if they realize what obstacles, what almost insuperable obstacles, they have been putting in the way of the successful prosecution of this war by the ocean freight rates they have been exacting.

"They are doing everything that high freight charges can do to make the war a failure, to make it impossible. I do not say that they realize this or intend it.

"The thing has happened naturally enough, because the commercial processes which we are content to see operate in ordinary times have without sufficient thought been continued into a period where they have no proper place.

"I am not questioning motives. I am merely stating a fact, and stating it in order that attention may be fixed upon it. The fact is that those who have fixed war freight rates have taken the most effective means in their power to defeat the armies engaged against Germany.

"When they realize this we may, I take it for granted, count upon them to reconsider the whole matter. It is high time. Their extra hazards are covered by war-risk insurance.

"I know and you know what response to this great challenge of duty and of opportunity the Nation will expect of you; and I know what response you will make.

"Those who do not respond, who do not respond in the spirit of those who have gone to give their lives for us on bloody fields far away, may safely be left to be dealt with by opinion and the law, for the law must, of course, command these things.

"I am dealing with the matter thus publicly and frankly, not because I have any doubt or fear as to the result, but only in order that in all our thinking and in all our dealings with one another we may move in a perfectly clear air of mutual understanding.

"And there is something more that we must add to our thinking. The public is now as much part of the Government as are the Army and Navy themselves; the whole people in all their activities are now mobilized and in service for the accomplishment of the Nation's task in this war; it is in such circumstances impossible justly to distinguish between industrial purchases made by the Government and industrial purchases made by the managers of individual industries; and it is just as much our duty to sustain the industries of the country, all the industries that contribute to its life, as it is to sustain our forces in the field and on sea.

"We must make the prices to the public the same as the prices to the Government. Prices mean the same thing everywhere now; they mean the efficiency or the inefficiency of the Nation, whether it is the Government that pays them or not. They mean victory or defeat.

"They mean that America will win her place once for all among the foremost free nations of the world or that she will sink to defeat and become a second-rate power alike in thought and in action. This is a day of her reckoning, and every man amongst us must personally face that reckoning along with her.

"The case needs no arguing. I assume that I am only expressing your own thoughts—what must be in the mind of every true man when he faces the tragedy and the solemn glory of the present war for the emancipation of mankind.

"I summon you to a great duty, a great privilege, a shining dignity and distinction.

"I shall expect every man who is not a slacker to be at my side throughout this great enterprise. In it no man can win honor who thinks of himself."

ADDRESS BY WILLIAM S. CULBERTSON.

Mr. CURTIS. I have copies of two addresses by William S. Culbertson, member of the United States Tariff Board, which I desire to have printed as public documents. I ask that the addresses be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

MEDALS OF HONOR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1720) to provide for the award of medals of honor and distinguished-service medals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 3, after the word "officers," to insert the words "but not"; on page 2, line 7, to strike out "has distinguished himself or" and after the word "himself" at the end of the line to insert the words "or within three years prior to the approval of this act has distinguished himself"; on page 2, line 22, to strike out "section 1216 of the Revised Statutes" and insert "previously existing law"; on page 3, line 1, to strike out "authorized by section 1285, Revised Statutes" and insert "heretofore authorized by law"; on page 4, line 8, strike out "Act" and insert "act"; on page 4, line 21, strike out "representatives" and insert "representative"; and on page 5, line 12, after the word "proviso," to insert a comma and the words "but all consideration of and action upon any of said cases shall be based exclusively upon official records now on file in the War Department," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of existing law relating to the award of medals of honor to officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates of the Army be, and they are hereby, amended so as to authorize the President to present, in the name of the Congress, a medal of honor only to each person who, while an officer or enlisted man of the Army, shall hereafter, in action involving actual conflict with an enemy, distinguish himself conspicuously by gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty.

That for especially distinguished service not sufficient to justify the award of the medal of honor the President may, on the recommendation of the proper commanding officer, but not in the name of Congress, award a distinguished-service medal of appropriate design and a ribbon, with a rosette or other device to be worn in lieu thereof, to any person who while an officer or enlisted man of the Army shall hereafter distinguish himself, or within three years prior to the approval of this act has distinguished himself, by exceptionally meritorious service to the Government in a duty of great responsibility or by extraordinary heroism in the line of his profession, and the award of such medal shall entitle an enlisted man of the Army to additional pay at the rate of $2 per month from the date on which he distinguished himself, and said additional pay shall continue throughout his active service, notwithstanding the fact that the service may not be continuous.

That the distinguished-service medal shall be issued to all enlisted men of the Army to whom the certificate of merit has been granted up to and including the date of the passage of this act under the provisions of previously existing law in lieu of such certificate of merit, and after the passage of this act the award of the certificate of merit for distinguished service shall cease. The additional pay heretofore authorized by law for holders of the certificate of merit shall not be paid to them, an equal payment being provided for them as holders of the distinguished-service medal by the last preceding paragraph of this act.

That no more than one medal of honor or one distinguished-service medal shall be issued to any one person; but for each succeeding deed of gallantry in action sufficient to justify the award of a medal of honor, and for each succeeding act of distinguished service sufficient to justify the award of a distinguished-service medal, such act being performed by an officer or enlisted man of the Army who shall have received one such medal, the President may award a suitable bar in lieu of another medal, and each bar in lieu of a distinguished-service medal received by an enlisted man shall entitled him to further additional pay of $2 per month from the date of the distinguished service for which the bar was awarded.

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend from the appropriations for contingent expenses of his department so much as may be necessary to defray the cost of the medals of honor, distinguished-service medals, bars, rosettes, and other devices hereinbefore provided for.

That whenever a medal, bar, ribbon, rosette, or other device presented under the provisions of this act shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use, without fault or neglect on the part of the person to whom it was awarded, such medal, bar, ribbon, rosette, or device shall be replaced without charge therefor.

That, except as otherwise prescribed herein, no medal of honor, distinguished-service medal, or bar in lieu of either of said medals, shall be issued to any person after more than three years from the date of the act justifying the award of said medal or bar, nor unless a specific statement or report distinctly setting forth the distinguished service and suggesting or recommending official recognition thereof shall have been made at the time of the distinguished service or within two years thereafter, nor unless it shall appear from the official records in the War Department that the officer or enlisted man, as the case may be, has so distinguished himself as to entitle him to the medal or bar: Provided, That in case an individual who shall distinguish himself becomes separated from the military service or dies before the award of the medal or bar to which he may be entitled, the award may nevertheless be made and the medal or bar presented within three years from the date of the act justifying the award of the medal or bar, to such person if living, or if he be dead, delivered to such representative of the deceased as the President may designate: Provided further, That no medal or bar shall be awarded or presented to any individual whose entire service subsequently to the time he distinguished himself shall not have been honorable: And provided further, That in cases of officers and enlisted men now in the Army for whom the award of the medal of honor has been recommended in full compliance with then existing regulations but on account of services which, though insufficient fully to justify the award of the medal of honor, appear to have been such as to justify the award of the distinguished-service medal hereinbefore provided for, such cases may be considered and acted upon under the provisions of this act authorizing the award of the distinguished-service medal, notwithstanding that said services may have been rendered more than three years before said cases shall have been considered as authorized by this proviso, but all consideration of and action upon any of said cases shall be based exclusively upon official records now on file in the War Department.

That the provisions of this act and other acts hereafter enacted for the award of campaign or service medals or badges shall apply to officers and enlisted men of all classes of troops hereafter in the military service of the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID L. BRAINARD.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 979) for the promotion and retirement of Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes in view of the conspicuous service in the Arctic of Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, he being one of the seven survivors of the original 25 members of the Greely Expedition, and of the injury to his eyesight resulting from exposure while in said service, which injury will necessitate his early retirement from active service, that the President be authorized to place that officer on the retired list of the Army, after over 40 years' active service, as a brigadier general, with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer of that grade, and to grant him a commission in accordance with such advanced rank.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 17) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have just returned to the Chamber. What is the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have asked unanimous consent to take up the Senate joint resolution providing for Nation-wide prohibition, with a view of determining whether a date might not be agreed upon for a vote.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator expect a vote on the joint resolution this morning?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not, but I wish to see if we can not agree on a date for a vote at some future time.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator want to discuss the joint resolution this morning?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not.

Mr. PENROSE. As I understand, the joint resolution is simply brought up with the desire of the Senator to have a unanimous-consent agreement as to a date to vote on the measure?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, I do not know but that the Senator from Texas may be able to obtain that agreement a little later, but I do not think he can do so this morning. We have one unanimous agreement now, and I do not think there are very many precedents for piling up unanimous-consent agreements. Later on, when the pending bill is disposed of, I want to assure the Senator that, so far as I am personally concerned, I shall not have any very strong disposition to create any permanent obstacle in the way of disposing of this measure, but I can not consent to it this morning.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Would the Senator from Pennsylvania object to making this joint resolution the special order for a night session?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not think we have reached a point where we need to have a night session. We are all working very hard, and many of us are working overtime.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not believe there will be any lengthy discussion upon it. For that reason we could dispose of it in one or two evening sessions.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not think there will be any very long discussion on the joint resolution, but I think there will be some very serious discussion of it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In view of the statements of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I withdraw my request for the present.

ACTIVITIES OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rise to state that I had intended calling up a resolution offered by me to investigate the activities and authority of the so-called public information committee, more particularly relating to an embellished story of an alleged encounter with submarines, but the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] was compelled to leave Washington last night on account of sickness in his family, and he made a special request that I should not call up the resolution until his return to Washington in the course of a few days. In deference to his request, I shall not call up the resolution this morning but shall await his return.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate, if the morning business has been concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to make an inquiry regarding a conference report pending between the two Houses. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], I believe, is chairman of the conference committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator to have the motion I have made disposed of, and then I will yield for that purpose?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] if any progress is being made by the conferees on House bill 4188, making it a crime to store or to corner food products? Some of us are very much interested in that bill and regard it as of the highest importance. We think it reaches a situation that should be controlled, and that an agreement between the two Houses upon this bill, which passed the Senate with practical unanimity, ought to be facilitated. I desire to ask the Senator whether any progress is being made?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's inquiry, I will say that the bill to which he refers passed the Senate on June 1. The conferees were appointed by the House, I think, on June 28 or 29. Since the appointment of the conferees on behalf of the House there have been several meetings of the conferees of the two bodies. We have, however, been unable to agree. The Senate conferees are insisting that the so-called Poindexter-Walsh amendment be retained in the bill; also that the Nelson amendment in regard to boards of trade be retained in the bill, and also several amendments in regard to the arid lands in the West.

The Senate conferees, representing the wishes of the Senate, have felt obliged to insist upon the retention of those amendments which passed the Senate, as suggested by the Senator from Michigan, by practically a unanimous vote. The House conferees have not seen proper to recede from their disagreement to those amendments. The result is that we have not as yet been able to reach an agreement, although we have had several conferences. I can not venture a prediction as to when an agreement will be reached.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, this is not a very important bill, having for its purpose the conservation of our food supply?

Mr. GORE. I share that opinion; and I was led to believe that the desire to pass it was urgent on the part of the Department of Agriculture, which was to administer the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I ask the Senator whether he is at liberty to state what influences, if any, are at work to prevent Congress from disposing of this bill which originated in the House and passed the Senate unanimously?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not believe that I would feel at liberty to answer the Senator's question. I believe other Senators have suggested from time to time perhaps the reason for the delay as to that measure in conference, but I feel obliged to state that we have not been able to agree. Of course, if the Senate conferees would recede on the amendments to which I have referred, the bill would probably come out; but we have not felt at liberty to recede, certainly not up to this time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will ask the Senator a further question. I ask whether or not the failure to pass this bill and make it a law does not afford latitude for the widest kind of speculation in foodstuffs, and whether there is any restraining hand to-day upon those who attempt to corner foodstuffs in the absence of this legislation?

Mr. GORE. I will say that whatever restraining power was intended to be conveyed by the Nelson amendment and the Poindexter-Walsh amendment, and whatever virtue they possess, are being withheld from the country in consequence of this delay; but if the Senate conferees should recede from those amendments the country would still be deprived of whatever advantage might come from those two amendments, and we have not felt justified, as representing our own views and as representing the views of the Senate, in surrendering those amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if those amendments, those wholesome amendments, adopted by the Senate were to be stricken from the bill, it would practically resolve itself into a seed-regulation measure, and would not have the effect or the importance which the bill now possesses. Would the Senator be willing to say whether the opposition of the House conferees is directed against the Senate amendments?

Mr. GORE. Of course, the House opposition is addressed to the Senate amendments, because the conferees have virtually reached an agreement as to the other amendments to the bill as it came over from the other House, relating to the amount of the appropriation, the seed provisions, and so forth. The disagreement is respecting the Nelson amendment, which undertakes to control or regulate the boards of trade, and the Walsh-Poindexter amendment, which undertakes to penalize cornering, holding, and monopolizing of foodstuffs and speculation in foodstuffs——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And gambling in foodstuffs.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; and certain arid-land amendments. Those provisions were placed in the bill by the Senate. The Senate conferees are insisting upon their acceptance, and the House conferees are holding out against them and persisting in their disagreement—and I use the word "persisting" in no offensive sense.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to add a word to what the Senator from Oklahoma has said. The Senator from Michigan will observe, if he will examine the bill, that a number of sections were added by the Senate on many different subjects that had nothing whatever to do with the real subject at issue in the bill. That is customary in the Senate. Section 11, which caused a good deal of delay, is a public-land question, and really has nothing whatever to do with this bill. Under that section the conferees have practically heard testimony and arguments of Senators at some length, which has tended to delay the bill.

The Senator will also observe, in going through the bill, that there are a number of public-land questions and reclamation questions involved, which have nothing whatever to do with the bill. I think that this should be added to the statement of the chairman of the committee as one of the causes for the delay.

Mr. GORE. I included in the suggestion the statement that those amendments have been the points of dispute.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The title of the act as it came from the House of Representatives was "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products." I assume that "facilitating the distribution of agricultural products" means that they shall not be cornered; that they shall not be monopolized for undue profit; and that their distribution among consumers shall be facilitated.

So far as the Nelson amendment is concerned, which deals directly with the regulation of boards of trade, it is very properly a part of this bill; it is a very wholesome provision; it met the unanimous approval of the Senate, and I can not understand why a measure of such transcendent importance should not be passed.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think possibly the Senator would have a remedy in moving the discharge of the conferees and the appointment of others. I am one of the conferees myself, and I should be very glad to have the Senator do that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think the Senate could be represented in any more efficient way than it is represented by the Senate conferees. That is the remotest thing from my mind. Nevertheless it must be a very strange thing to the conferees on the part of the Senate that action can not be obtained; that no consideration was given for weeks to a measure of such transcendent importance as this. Except for the fuel provisions of the bill that is now the unfinished business, I regard that measure as of more importance than the one we are now considering.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to say on behalf of the House conferees that they are of opinion that the section in the pending bill relating to boards of trade is preferable to the Nelson amendment, and that the section in the pending bill in regard to holding is better than the Walsh-Poindexter amendment to the bill in conference, and that perhaps is a restraining influence on them. I feel that we ought to say that in justice to the House conferees.

Mr. President, I desire to offer a substitute for the pending bill. I may say that it is an amendment in the nature of a substitute, striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the substitute which I had printed on yesterday. Senators will find this substitute on their desks, excepting that section 1 has been changed, in the copy which I shall have read, to meet certain contingencies that were unprovided for in the bill as printed on yesterday. There is only one other slight amendment.

I ask that the substitute be read down to and including section 9. I shall not ask that section 10 be read, because it is a literal transcript of the Nelson amendment in regard to boards of trade heretofore adopted. I shall not ask to have section 11 read, because it is a literal transcript of the Poindexter-Walsh amendment heretofore agreed to by the Senate and bearing the stamp of the Senate's approval. I have merely added one sentence, providing that it shall not be construed to repeal the Sherman antitrust law. I shall not ask to have read the sections of the substitute following section 11, because they are substantial copies of the sections of the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substitute is not in order at the present time, as there is an amendment pending that has not been disposed of.

Mr. GORE. I was not aware of that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Therefore the substitute is out of order at this time.

Mr. GORE. Very well. Then I will not prefer the request at this time. I was not so advised.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, President Wilson's first administration was a brilliant record of things accomplished. From its commencement to its close he was buttressed by a safe and reliable majority in both Houses of the Congress. Between the Executive and that majority was a common purpose, outlined in the Democratic platform of 1912. To the due performance of that purpose both were solemnly committed. Their responsibility to the country was mutual. It was effectively discharged through close and constant cooperation of the Executive and the Senate and the House, upon planes of procedure comprehended and accepted by them all. This presupposed conference and discussion, through which differences were composed or eliminated, objections recognized or discarded, and contentions accepted or abandoned. Conferences were in turn the offspring of organized efforts and our legislative majorities became efficient through the cohesion of their units, who after full and unlimited discussion among themselves voiced their conclusions through the machinery of the caucus. Teamwork was both watchword and byword of Democratic procedure.

Through the systematized processes of political strategy and tactics, Democracy then proved fully equal to the burden of its self-assumed task; it kept the faith it had pledged to the people; the fruitage of its labors became the harbinger of a second and greater triumph; its deeds were catalogued in the platform of 1916 and emphasized as a guaranty of kindred performances yet to be achieved; and the people in generous response to the fidelity of its chosen representatives gave its President the largest vote of confidence ever cast in the annals of the Republic.

During the eventful sessions of the last two Congresses, when reform after reform was enacted into law and abuse after abuse was successfully assailed, when Democratic trenches were always held and Democratic drives were always successful, our opponents sought to weaken our assaults and undermine our strength by attacking the caucus system. They denounced it by day and by night, in season and out of season. It was undemocratic, tyrannical, enslaving. It suppressed conviction, deprived its Members of all initiative, destroyed individuality, and substituted the majority of the majority for Senate and House. It was the stronghold of national abuses, the citadel of legislative despotism. He who entered its circle surrendered his opinions, abandoned his independence, stifled his conscience, lost his self-respect, and ceased to be a public representative. This chorus was sung in many keys. It was voiced in countless changes of expression by progressive, by reactionary, and by independent, but it was always the same refrain. We were warned of the coming of a day of wrath, when the people, waxing indignant over Democratic indifference to these remonstrances, would overflow its restraints and bury us under the overwhelming flood of its disapproval. We were making a travesty of self-government by exalting the prerogative of "King Caucus." We had created a Frankenstein which had bound us with cords. We had become its puppets and registered its decrees as it demanded.

But we were not the sole offenders. The President, it was said, had sinned and was sinning as grievously. He had with sinister presumption assumed the leadership of the Nation. He did not advise legislation but commanded it. He transgressed the proprieties by frequently visiting the Capitol and conferring with party leaders. He urged support for administration measures. He had invaded the province of legislation. He had arrogated many of its functions to himself. He was a flagrant usurper. He was an Executive meddler in things that were designed for other spheres of action. He was disturbing, if not seriously disarranging, the distribution of constitutional powers. He menaced the equilibrium of coordinated authority. He was degrading the powers and the dignity of the Congress. This conduct, too, was said to be under the angry scrutiny of a jealous electorate, outraged by Executive usurpations, and impatient for the arrival of the hour when it could launch its thunderbolt of disapproval; but the work of constructive legislation continued its course, and when the hour came the work and the workmen received the approval of the people; the work had been performed as the workmen selected had promised; results had been demanded; when achieved, they became the silent but eloquent advocates of the methods which wrought them.

We were returned to power charged with the completion of an unfinished task of constructive legislation. Under normal conditions we should have continued that task as we had conducted it; but our entrance into the great war has turned us away from it. Economic and social problems, however compelling and insistent, have been thrust aside by the tremendous demands of the hour. They have been shelved until peace shall have returned to the nations. Party lines have been obscured by the fervent heat of a common patriotism. Ancient and ineradicable party differences have for the time been forgotten. Congress has responded with alacrity until now to the President's call for support. We have declared war, enacted universal conscription, voted vast supplies, increased the personnel of the Army and Navy, and equipped the President with unlimited powers of espionage on land and sea, and we have assumed a common responsibility in committee work and in conforming to the recommendations of the departments. This would be commendable if it were not the obvious course for freemen in a time of crisis. Would that it might continue.

But, Mr. President, time is passing. As we recede from the supreme moment when the die was cast and the Nation's decision declared our zeal for cooperation seems to be declining. We are becoming less compliant with the demands of the administration, more critical of its policies, more apprehensive of its possible misuse of undue and enlarged authority. The concerns of business and the profit mongerer are becoming more obtrusive. The vast opportunities for gain which a great war creates and the limitations upon them which the Executive may impose through bills like that under consideration are crystallizing into vigorous opposition. Reformers are perceiving the opportunity to accomplish their objects by short cuts in legislation through amendments to war measures. Ambition whispers loudly and yet more loudly, in ears accustomed to her voice, of the harvest that may be reaped from seed now wisely sown; and some good men, wise men, honest, patriotic men, are beginning to shrink from a task whose performance is imperative if we are to triumph, lest mistakes occur and disaster come to men and to occupations through laws seemingly required for the commonweal.

I reflect upon the motive of no man when I assert that the plight of the pending bill is due to the operation of all these influences and to the absence of any organized support behind it. It has been set upon by almost everyone. Friend and foe have sought to improve or mutilate it. Both have partially succeeded. What it will resemble when it passes through yonder door on its lame and reluctant journey to the conference chamber omniscience alone can tell. And what it will resemble when it returns from that perilous journey is mercifully hidden from its sponsors by the impenetrable curtain of the future.

Mr. President, the injection of prohibition into this measure under the guise of food conservation, albeit well intended, has proven unfortunate for the country, for the bill, and for the cause. I will not say that it was not germane, for under our system of legislation all things are germane to a measure for a designated object "and for other purposes." A bill introduced to regulate the Papago Indians may emerge from this Chamber as an act to provide penalties for transporting onions by mail, or a bill to encourage enlistments in the Army may be readily transformed into an act providing pensions for deserters. But the proposal to enforce prohibition by drastic methods, by the confiscation of property, and by providing for its summary operation is unprecedented. It arouses controversy too deep, too widespread, and too far-reaching to make possible its speedy enactment. Moreover, its hasty and passionate consideration necessitates a result which satisfies no one.

Section 13 of the bill as it passed in committee of the whole on Saturday last may well claim consideration as the most unique, the most absurd, the most serious, the most expensive, and the most revolutionary, half-baked, ill-considered specimen of compromise legislation to be found in the records of an English-speaking lawmaking body of any country at any time in any age. It is a reflection upon our intelligence and a libel upon our common sense. It can only serve to humiliate us at home and abroad, if, indeed, it does not engender a grave doubt of our capacity to confront and dispose of crises as they shall develop during the progress of the war.

The section passed the House in intelligent form. It prohibited the use of foodstuffs for the distillation or fermentation of beverages during the war period. I did not indorse it. It was simple, but drastic. Here it has been bombed and gassed and shelled into linguistic fragments. It successively encountered contention, controversy, and chaos. In so far as it admits of construction, it seems to require that the President shall purchase all distilled liquors held in bond when the act goes into effect at their actual cost plus 10 per cent. To do this he must be equipped with from $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 for the investment, and this at a time when we are straining every nerve to secure revenue for national needs of the most insistent description. He will be the most colossal owner of distilled liquor the world ever saw, but he can not dispose of his wares except as we may hereafter direct. Presumably this is to be done in the cause of prohibition, and also to guard the owner against confiscation of his wares.

Apart from our obvious constitutional inability to take the property of the citizen at a rate of compensation fixed by legislative enactment, it is apparent that this prohibitory process will not prohibit. On the contrary, it will for the time being increase the consumption of distilled liquors. These will be taken out of bond in prodigious quantities in anticipation of our final action. Once removed they must find a market. They will be made attractive to consumers, who will, in turn, lay in as large a store as possible against the dread day when moisture is no longer a fact but a sweet and lingering reminiscence.

Moreover, the crisis of the distiller will be the opportunity of the rectifier. The latter has no liquors in bond. I wonder if the Senator from Iowa knew this when on Friday last he presented his amendment forbidding the withdrawal of distilled liquors from bond during the war. He stated his purpose in offering it with his customary clearness and candor. He wanted to wage the war with a sober Nation. But this commendable purpose could not be accomplished by a policy which restrains the traffic of one class of liquor manufacturers only. It merely gives a monopoly to the other class, which will naturally make hay while the sun shines. I have no wish to misrepresent anyone here, not even the rectifier. I hope I do him no injustice in saying that of all offenders against national sobriety he is the most reprehensible. He does not offer his patrons the "liquid hell," so repellant to the perfervid Senator from Illinois, but something "just as good." He needs neither distillery nor bonded warehouse for his production. All he requires is a lot of neutral spirits commonly known as alcohol, a supply of water reasonably free from impurities, a little bead oil, and a variety of flavoring extracts. From these he compounds a perfect imitation of any distilled beverage known to the trade. He will run the gamut from a mild distillate designed to inspire genial conviviality to a mixture two fingers of which would start a Quaker on the warpath, and his output is whisky. A President of the United States has so decided.

Section 13 as we have amended it does not require the President to buy this sort of merchandise, nor yet prohibit its manufacture. No foodstuffs are needed to produce it, and nothing short of national prohibition can eliminate it. Until that great object can be effected what a boon to the rectifier will section 12 become when written upon the statute books of the country. He will doubtless, like the bootlegger, become for commercial reasons an advocate of war-prohibition measures.

This section adds fully half a billion dollars to the total of our annual expenditure, if we may assume it to be proof against constitutional objections. To my mind that assumption is a most violent one. The Supreme Court, however, has quite recently destroyed the State's essential powers of eminent domain over the domain within its boundaries not actually used by the Federal Government for its own purposes; so I am finally prepared to concede that law is law, save as that omniscient tribunal shall otherwise declare. To add this vast sum to the enormous burden under which we are now staggering is excusable only by the stress of a dire necessity which can not be avoided. Who will pretend the existence of such a necessity?

If any such there be, let me ask him to suggest the rock from which this treasure may be still supplied, and the Moses who can strike it with his rod and compel its streams of revenue to gush forth.

Not only do we impose this new expense upon the people, we deprive them of one of their largest and most reliable sources of revenue, a source from which half our supplies have been obtained for more than a generation. I am perfectly familiar with the attitude of the prohibitionist toward it, and I am unreservedly committed to his proposed elimination of it by constitutional amendment. But I am opposed to its arbitrary elimination by statutory process, which substitutes nothing for it and which leaves us groping blindly and against the bitter opposition of taxpayers for something else as a base of revenue for the pressing needs of a distressed Government. Indeed, I am frankly amazed that the Senate of the United States, sometimes regarded as the greatest deliberative body in the world, ostensibly comprising men of experience in affairs of state, reasonably familiar with national needs and with the capacity to provide for them, should have done this thing. I fully understand and appreciate the motive which led it to vote for purchase as a sole alternative to confiscation when that seemed inevitable, and I should have so voted at that juncture had I been in my seat; but I can account for the final acceptance of section 13, as it passed on Saturday afternoon, upon no hypothesis of a national character. It is a farrago of nonassimilable elements, the net result of a rough-and-tumble fight between elemental forces conducted without rules, without reason, and without an umpire. Neither side prevailed, nor either yet unhorsed. But the prestige of the Senate has suffered, and the prospect of an adjournment before the snows of November has gone with the breeze of yesterday.

What other casualties this bill may encounter before a final vote is reached may not be wholly foreseen. That it will confront a number is inevitable. And I fear the same may be prophesied of every war measure which from now on we shall be required to consider. That they should be discussed and analyzed is obvious. Such is our duty. But that they are to become the vehicles for divers schemes of legislation not germane to the needs and crisis of war is neither obvious nor desirable. Yet it seems inevitable unless the party here dominant shall assert its authority and hold our procedure to the needs which summoned us in extraordinary session. Mr. President, order and system are the binding forces of community life. They are essential to human progress. They are merely other names for modern civilization. Action is possible only when they prevail. Inaction and disintegration assume the reins when they disappear. They are as necessary in legislative bodies as in the courts of justice or the currents of trade. Without them responsibility can not be centralized.

To secure them in free Government political parties are essential—one to rule, the other to criticize. The people choose between them, and their choice is final until it is changed. But we are now trying to legislate here without regard to fundamentals. Ordinary methods are suspended. Party organization is nominal. Responsibility is neither felt nor recognized. Every man acts for himself. Each is an independent. Cohesion is either absent or is accidental. Groups form to aid or to obstruct through personal or local considerations, and section 13 is a natural, albeit an extreme, specimen of their handiwork.

Neither the caucus nor the rule of the individual can be reproached by such offspring. Better the caucus as pictured in the lurid background of Republican imagery; better Aldrichism, more baleful than ever described by the genius of Democracy; better a continuation of both at this hour of the Nation's destiny than a chamber of deputies animated by lofty purposes but without the mechanism to accomplish them. A babel of tongues is not more barren than a confusion of methods.

Mr. President, this Nation has successfully waged four great wars. For the prosecution of each the party then in power was justly held responsible. Each had the cooperation of all good citizens without regard to party. To each was awarded the full meed of praise that goes with victory. It could not be otherwise. We are now in the opening stages of a fifth great war, the greatest of them all. The crisis came with the reinauguration of a Democratic President, whose hands are upheld and whose action is supported by the entire Nation, the devotion of whose representatives knows neither party nor section. As they have begun so may they continue. The voice of the President is the voice of America.

But, Mr. President, war legislation is not and will not be unanimous. It should not be. War policies, however capable and efficient, are not perfect. They can not be. Both will provoke comment, and frequently bitter criticism. They should do so. Both will provoke opposition. That is inevitable. Free government will disappear when such conditions disappear. By such methods errors are corrected, mistakes are rectified, evil or mistaken policies eliminated, inefficient men retired, and capable leadership and service secured. It follows that in war intelligent opposition is more necessary, more useful, nay, more indispensable than ever. Healthy, conscientious, and vigorous criticism at all times, and opposition when required, is consistent with the loftiest and most disinterested patriotism.

It must come from the party in opposition. It will be directed against the party in power. That party must yield to it or overcome it. It should yield when conditions justify it, and overcome it when they do not. Hence, Democratic responsibility for the successful prosecution of this war is as obvious as will be the same responsibility for defeat, should that be the end of the conflict.

This is not to assert that we are waging a Democratic war. It is the Nation's war, in the conduct of which both great parties have their parts to play. They are in concert as to the Nation and its needs. They may be in dissent as to details and prosecution. And this will become more extensive as events are unfolded by the future.

Hence we must and should answer for all that goes wrong in the tremendous drama now staged across the world. And hence the greater need for wise and mature legislation, for the union of heads and of hearts for the better service of our country and ourselves.

My fellow Democratic Senators, we are at least morally responsible for section 13, and for the fate of this bill, for we are in control of the Senate. It behooves us to make due compliance with administration requests for needed war legislation by supporting them whenever we can and by promoting their speedy disposition whether we can or not. If we are to do this effectively, we must again resort to teamwork. I do not counsel the indorsement of war bills as party measures, nor yet their previous consideration apart from our associates across the aisle. But I do urge that when any bill reaches or threatens to reach an impasse like that now confronting us we should discharge our duty as the dominant force in this body, and relieve ourselves from the reproach of incompetency by counseling together and outlining an effective method for the speedy disposition of the pending business. This will relieve, if it does not satisfy, our Republican colleagues. It will receive the indorsement of public opinion, and it will vindicate our asserted capacity for managing the affairs of the Nation, and aiding the administration to conduct the affairs of the war to a successful issue. Unless we do this we shall make slow headway in sorely needed legislation. Bills for revenue, for trading with the enemy, to promote our export trade, practically all the so-called war measures in contemplation are apt otherwise to go awry. They will be amended, as doubtless they should be; but they should pass under the control and be guided by the intelligent organism of a majority when in their progress they threaten to become waterlogged. Either this or they will drift like rudderless vessels subject alike to the influence of every storm and every vagrant breeze. They may reach a harbor some time, somewhere, but far more apt to become submerged in a Sargasso Sea of senatorial controversy.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask leave to submit an amendment to the pending bill and that it may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). It is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the pending amendment may be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], on behalf of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, offers the following amendment:

On page 16, at the end of line 2, in the original print of the bill, insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That such operations, practices, and transactions, at, on, or in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or other similar institution or place of business, as are not prohibited by the regulations made by the President, pursuant to the provisions of this section, shall not be deemed to be within the intent and meaning of section 6 of this act."

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is interested in this amendment and he temporarily stepped out of the Chamber.

Mr. HARDWICK. I was about to take the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Georgia, however, desires to take the floor I shall not suggest the absence of a quorum, as I intended to do for the reason stated.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not care to detain the Senate very long, certainly not at all upon the pending amendment. I have not yet had time to determine what its exact effect will be. But there are some brief observations which I wish to make with respect to the bill and the situation we are in with respect to it, if we may believe current newspaper reports and current gossip in the Senate itself. It seems that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is preparing a substitute for the bill, or has prepared such a substitute——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me correct the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee had under consideration the proposed substitute of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and the committee concluded not to report it as a committee amendment, so it has been presented this morning as the Gore substitute and will be treated as an individual proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as discussion has begun on the bill, there are so few Senators present that I suggest the absence of a quorum, so that those who are interested may hear the discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Gronna	McKellar	Simmons
Beckham	Hale	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Harding	Martin	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hardwick	New	Smith, Mich.
Broussard	Hollis	Newlands	Smoot
Calder	Husting	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	James	Overman	Sutherland
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Thomas
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Tillman
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Townsend
Fernald	Kellogg	Ransdell	Trammell
Fletcher	Kendrick	Reed	Wadsworth
France	Kenyon	Shafroth	Warren
Frelinghuysen	King	Sheppard	Watson
Gerry	Knox	Sherman	Weeks
Gore	La Follette	Shields	Williams

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to anounce that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained on account of important business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence on public business of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on public business.

Mr. GERRY. The senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, as I was remarking, it seems to be reasonably true that no matter whether formal action by the committee is officially taken or not a majority—a very great majority—of the Committee on Agriculture has succeeded in framing and agreeing upon a substitute for this measure, which, to my mind, would greatly improve it and would render its passage at an early date a practical certainty. Let me say, before I pass from that, that I have had some little opportunity to examine the substitute, and while I would not vote for the bill even if the substitute were adopted, because I am utterly opposed to the basic principles that underlie all of this legislation, yet, in my judgment, the substitute would be much better than the bill itself and I shall, therefore, vote for the substitute, although I am opposed to the main proposition. If we could get a vote on the substitute, and it should have the strength in the Senate that its friends believe it has, and should be adopted by the Senate, I think we can settle this controversy without any considerable delay and send this entire matter to conference where it must be finally thrashed out anyway, no matter what we send there. I hope we will take a test of the sentiment of the Senate at an early day on that question, because if that is the true situation we have a quick way out of the present difficulty. It seems to me as though the Senate in the consideration of this bill has muddled the waters every time it touched it. It has got it so now that I believe most of its friends are afraid to vote for it or, at least, they are not eager to do so. It has got it in such shape that even its most ardent advocates look at it with coy shyness, and are not certain whether they are ruining or helping the country when they vote to pass it.

Of course, a situation like that is somewhat amusing to a man in my position, who does not believe in any of it and who is perfectly willing to vote against all of it. The only thing that I covet, so far as my personal record is concerned, is an opportunity to vote against it. However, I think it is my duty as a Member of the Senate to help the Senate perfect the proposition, if such a proposition as this can be perfected, or, if according to my viewpoint it can not be perfected, to make it as little injurious as possible. I am willing to discharge that function whenever I have an opportunity to do so.

While on this subject, Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senate that there is a provision in this bill totally disconnected with the basic principles which are supposed to underlie and, which, to my mind, is the only good proposition in it; and that is the proposition in section 3, in the original print, preventing these patriots who are serving the country without compensation on these various advisory commissions which we have from coupling their patriotism and their profits in selling from their own private concerns, or the concerns with which they are associated, to the Government which they are supposed to represent. I earnestly hope that the new draft, for which I hope to be able to vote, will not omit that very wise and salutary provision.

Mr. President, I do not agree, as every Member of this body knows, blindly with everything that the President of the United States says; in fact, I disagree with him so frequently that it is a matter of pleasure to me to have him say something once in a while that I can agree to. I want to express my hearty concurrence in one sentiment which he expressed this morning. The President of the United States said, in an interview published in the newspapers this morning—I am not attempting to quote literally—that it was infamous for people to undertake to couple their profits and their patriotism. Well, so I say it is; and for the first time in my life I have heard it suggested among honorable men that it is something that Congress ought to be censured for, because we object to men posing as patriots and serving the Government without compensation, selling with their left hand and buying with their right hand, because we are opposed to any set of men representing the Government and turning around and buying from themselves or the concerns in which they are pecuniarily interested. I do not intend to reflect, of course, upon the opinion or view of any Senator who may entertain a contrary view, but it always looked to me as though such line of conduct was in direct opposition to the elementary propositions of common honesty in all public dealings. In the smallest town or village——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Connecticut will pardon me just a moment, I will yield to him. In the smallest town or village in my State it is an unthinkable thing, and one punishable by law, that a member of a council should buy supplies for the public, for the city, from any concern in which he is pecuniarily interested. So it is an unthinkable thing in the county that the county commissioners—and you must remember the members of the council in most of the little towns in this Republic serve entirely without compensation—the county commissioners of the several counties of the Commonwealth in which I reside should buy for the county from any concern in which they are pecuniarily interested. So it is with State officers, and so it ought to be as to one of the highest tribunals and commissions in this land. With all respect to any Senator who may take a different position, or who may entertain a different opinion, I can only say that it is incomprehensible to my mind that it should be seriously insisted that these men ought to represent the Government in a fiduciary capacity—whether with or without compensation is utterly immaterial—in a capacity which gives their recommendation the virtual force and effect of law, and then turn around and buy from the concerns in which they are pecuniarily interested. I think the Senate ought to stop it. If it is not stopped, it is liable to cause a public scandal. If not, the lid will blow off, and that without very much longer delay.

During a temporary absence from the Senate I was shocked and astonished to see that members of this advisory committee had the temerity to rush into print to defend their right to do that sort of thing and to assail and assault the Senate of the United States because it had the manhood and the honesty to put into the law the express provision that this sort of thing should not be allowed; that if they desire to sell to the Government, they must not buy for the Government, even in a position that carries no salary with it. The President is right. Let us separate patriotism and profits; they do not go hand in hand; they have no real connection, and they should not be connected even in these advisory committees, in my opinion.

Therefore I express the hope, Mr. President, that whatever form this measure takes, whether the Senate shall agree to the amendment to be proposed by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or not, that, whatever proposition we finally adopt, the language contained in the section originally reported in the bill by the Senate committee prohibiting transactions of the kind I have complained of should be retained.

I have no feeling against these gentlemen; I do not know any of them; I have no desire to do any one of them the slightest injustice. It is simply incomprehensible to me that they could seriously insist that they have any such right as Mr. Rosenwald asserted in a published statement. If they want to serve the Government, they must get rid of their private interests, if those interests are to sell to the Government, or, at least, must sever their connection with them; or certainly, if they want to serve the Government, they must not buy from concerns in which they hold and have a pecuniary interest.

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] wanted to interrupt me. Does he still desire to do so?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was either going to put it in the form of a question or a suggestion. I do not understand that the members of this advisory council of the Council of National Defense are buying from themselves.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, they buy from the concerns in which they are interested.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not understand that they are buying at all. I can not speak by the card about it; I have had no communication with any of these gentlemen; and I do not know any of them. I am in that respect in the same situation as is the Senator from Georgia. I do not think enough is known by the public about the methods which they have adopted; but, so far as I have any idea about it, it is this—that they do advise when certain supplies shall be bought——

Mr. HARDWICK. From whom?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And say what in their judgment would be a fair price. They take the bids that are made and advise the department whether the bids——

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator——

Mr. BRANDEGE. Just a moment, please—whether the bids offer a fair price or not.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to correct the Senator. I happen to have accurate knowledge, and I do speak by the card on that question. I can tell the Senator exactly what they do, because we had that question before the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not suppose that they bought of themselves or that they made any contract in behalf of the Government or that they had any authority to make contracts in behalf of the Government. Of course, if they do, I would not approve of that at all. Has the Senator any knowledge that they have authority to make contracts?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am going to tell the Senator exactly how it is done, because it was told by a Cabinet officer at the head of it—I refer to the Secretary of War—to a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee on which I was serving. The law, the Senator will remember, simply authorizes these gentlemen to investigate facts and to report their conclusions to the Council of National Defense, but the actual practice has been, unless it has been changed since Secretary Baker gave his testimony before the Senate Committee on Appropriations—and I see several Senators here who were associated with me in that work, and I hope, if I do not state it with absolute accuracy, that they will correct me; I am stating my recollection but think I am right—the practice has been that the War Department would want to buy blankets for instance, and the War Department officials would say, "We are going to buy blankets according to the recommendations of the Council of National Defense," and the Council of National Defense would recommend not only the price they ought to pay but from whom the Government ought to buy. The War Department and every other department of the Government have taken the position that they were absolutely going to follow the recommendations of this committee. I will ask the Senator from Utah if that is not his understanding of it?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not follow the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that is right. I should like to be corrected if it is not. That is the impression that was made upon my mind at least.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Suppose that is so, the heads of the departments are responsible.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true, if the Senator please; but, after all, under the policy adopted and the practice, these men are really buying, for every department is buying according to the recommendations of these men.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, if that is so, why should criticism be directed against these men? It seems to me that, even if this advisory council were abolished, if the head of the War Department or of the Navy Department or of any other department of the Government needing supplies is responsible, he ought to make due inquiry and find out, from consultation, not only with bidders but from the best information he can get all over the country, whether or not he ought to accept a certain price.

Mr. HARDWICK. I agree to that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If there were no Council of National Defense at all and the department chief was thrown upon his own resources to go out and consult the experts of the country, he would not consider that he was bound to take the advice of a certain expert or a certain set of experts. It seems to me that the criticism ought to be directed at the heads of the departments.

Now, while I am on my feet, I simply desire to say that I have been told—and I am not sure about it—that in England they have a similar council——

Mr. HARDWICK. I presume they have; and probably that is the reason we have it here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Composed of men who are interested in companies, which, when the contracts are awarded, participate in the sale of the product under the contract to the Government; but it is required that whenever one of the members of the council is interested in any company which may furnish a part of the supplies, he shall file a written declaration to that effect in advance——

Mr. HARDWICK. And retire.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And shall not participate in advising about that product.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all in the world that this statute would require.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. All in the world what statute would require?

Mr. HARDWICK. The provision of this bill, which I am urging shall be kept in it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was directing my remarks not so much to the suggestion of the Senator about this particular amendment, but to the remarks that were made on the floor the other day by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], that this advisory commission itself was at fault and ought to be abolished and superseded by a purchasing board of supplies or something of that kind.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Connecticut has inadvertently misquoted me. I dealt with the proposition of men dealing with themselves, and I mentioned a concrete case. I protested against the proposition as a matter of principle. I did not say that the board ought to be abolished. Some people have said that if the rule of equity, the rule of the statute, and the rule of conscience, as it is expressed in this amendment, were applied, the board would have to go out of business; but I never said that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not mean that the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Tennessee agreed entirely in their remarks, but the Senator from Tennessee certainly introduced an amendment here, which is now pending, to create a purchasing board of supplies and food, or something of that kind.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I have about concluded what I have to say. The Senator from Connecticut makes a suggestion that I think comes squarely within the language, and certainly within the purpose, of this amendment reported by the committee. If anyone of these men is interested in the question, of course he ought not to be allowed to advise the Government, and the law will not permit him to advise it if this section is adopted. I think we ought to stick to it, and I think the Senate will agree with me.

Now, I quite agree that the heads of the executive departments of this Government ought not to permit this thing to be done, and to a certain extent, if what we are being informed is accurate, I think the Secretaries themselves could correct it; but the principle——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator permit me there

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Here is what is lying in my mind: The Government needs steel in great quantities, of course.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If it is so that no governmental department can send for an official of the Steel Corporation, which perhaps produces 60 per cent of the product of the country, and ask him anything about steel, or get his expert opinion, without depriving the Government of using any product made by the great subsidiaries of the Steel Corporation, it would seem to me to be an absurd proposition.

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Senator, and I for one moment would not favor that; but I do say that if that man is representing the man who is going to sell, he ought not to stand behind the buyers' counter. Let us confer with him and get all the information and all the help that his patriotism will permit him or will induce him to give to the Government, but frankly——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree to that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But I am simply so amazed that I can not give credulity to the assertion or the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia that these departments absolutely duck the responsibility, that they are simply rubber stamps of the advisory council and have to order whatever the council suggest.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Georgia thinks he is right about it; that is the impression the Secretary's statement made on his mind; but if he is not right, he not only challenges, but invites, any Senator here to correct him.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is the Senator from Georgia correct in his assumption as to the relations of the advisory commission to the Council of National Defense? I am aware that there is a great deal of misunderstanding regarding those relations; or, rather, there is a lack of certainty of knowledge upon the subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And I think the matter might well be cleared up by some clear and definite statement from the Council of National Defense; but, if the Senator will permit me for just a moment——

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield willingly to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will give my view of what those relations are.

As I understand, the Council of National Defense and the advisory commission were both authorized by law, and Congress, of course, is responsible for that, though it was probably done at the suggestion of the administration. Now, as I understand, the purpose of the Council of National Defense is to bring a number of Cabinet officials into coordination——

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is right.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So that they can form a united judgment upon information regarding matters of importance relating to the national defense. I understand that the advisory commission was organized—perhaps it is a misnomer to term it an advisory commission—for the purpose of mobilizing, in some definite form, the various industries of the country, so that these industries which must furnish materials for the war would have committees composed of the most capable and efficient men in those various industries, regarded as the chiefs of these industries—captains of industries, if we may so term them—with whom the Council of National Defense could advise; and the assumption was that these men, having the information, would not lack the patriotism and the sense of duty that is essential in the discharge of the duties that belong to that position.

I do not understand that the members of the advisory commission have anything to do with the fixing of prices. On the contrary, I understand that they are there frankly as sellers. The very purpose of the legislation was to mobilize the sellers, through their responsible heads, so that they could aid the Government itself in this business of furnishing supplies to the Army and Navy. Thus we have in the advisory commission the sellers of transportation, a committee representing the railroad companies; we have the sellers of steel products, represented by Mr. Gary and others who are at the head of the steel industry; we have the sellers of coal, represented by Mr. Peabody and others who represent the great coal industry. They are there frankly as sellers, and I do not understand that there is any concealment about it.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Nevada were right about that, there would not be a single excuse in the world for this section that the committee reported, and not a single reason to take that sort of action. Unfortunately, however, I think he is wrong, and if the Senator will read the statement of Secretary Baker before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, when its subcommittee was considering this great $3,000,000,000 appropriation bill, I think he will find that it is not the way it works out in practice.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I shall be glad to read that, because I can not believe that men as capable as these men who constitute the Council of National Defense would turn over to these committees that are frankly committees of sellers, organized for the purpose of giving information, any part of the purchasing power of the Government.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will let me conclude, I think, if the Senator pleases, that the thing has been a little twisted from the way it started. I expect that the idea to start on was as now suggested by the Senator from Nevada, but unless I am misinformed—and I certainly do not want to do anyone injustice—it has worked out in this way: Your committee of "advisors"—frankly, sellers, you say—have become a committee of buyers, because whatever they recommend as to price and as to the person from whom the purchase is to be made is adopted and agreed to by everybody in the several executive departments.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator let me give one illustration of what was done?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand, the building of cantonments came up—these structures that are intended for our soldiers. It is said that these structures composed of wood are much cheaper than tents if they are to be used longer than six months; and the Council of National Defense got into communication with a committee of the advisory commission representing all the lumber operators of the country, and wished them to mobilize that industry, to see to it that the Government could get an ample supply of lumber at every point desired within a reasonable time, so that these structures could be quickly put up.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just wanted to make this suggestion: They certainly did not undertake to mobilize all the lumber industry. I happen to come from a city which is one of the largest lumber markets in the world, and I believe the largest in this country at the present time; and no lumber merchant from my city was permitted to be either on the Council of National Defense or on the inside circle, as it is called. Surely there could not have been a mobilization of the lumber industry of the country without including Memphis.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course I know nothing of that particular instance; and, understand me, I do not claim accurate knowledge about the subject. I am stating what I——

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is stating what he thought they would do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes. Now, then, what I heard was done—and it seemed to me a rather reasonable thing——

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, it would be reasonable if it worked that way.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It was very obvious that if they put out immediately public bids for lumber all over the country at specified prices, this extraordinary demand, precipitated upon perhaps a limited supply, would result probably in very excessive prices being charged by all the bidders.

Mr. HARDWICK. Competition would make that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes. I think myself that the beneficial features of the law of supply and demand are almost paralyzed now in this country, owing to the extraordinary demands caused by the war, and that if you rely upon the law of supply and demand the necessary result of this enormous demand, precipitated upon a moderate supply, will be an enormous increase of prices.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, I believe I would rather let him take the floor in his own right later on. I want to finish. I am almost through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield further.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was only going to add another statement.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator, then, of course.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will simply state that they appealed to these men to confer throughout the country with reference to a reasonable price and immediate delivery, and that the statement was made that they would furnish lumber everywhere at the uniform price of seventeen dollars and a half per thousand. With my limited knowledge of such matters, I should regard that as a reasonable price, and probably a much more reasonable price than would have been secured by public bidding, and certainly the speed of delivery was much promoted by this method, as probably the railroad committee and the lumber committee of the advisory commission cooperated to that end.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, if the thing had been done in the way the Senator thinks it ought to have been done and thought it was to be done, I do not think there would be any necessity for this section. On the other hand, if it has not been done in any way except the way the Senator thinks it ought to be done and thought it had been done, the section will not hurt anybody; because the section referred to, which is carried in both propositions—both the pending bill and the substitute proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]—reads in this way:

That it is hereby declared unlawful for any person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the Government in any capacity, including an advisory capacity to any commission, board, or council of the Government, to procure, attempt to procure, or make any contract for the purchase of any supplies for the use of the Government either from himself, from any firm of which he is a member, or corporation of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in which he has any financial interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not just for the moment. Now, if he does not do those things, the statute will not do him any harm. If he does do those things, the statute ought to prevent it and punish him. It will not have any effect on people who are only doing what the Senator from Nevada thinks ought to be done—and he is right about it—and no more; but if they do undertake to do more, then the law itself must enforce this rule of honesty and morality upon them. So it seems to me that the Senator from Nevada would be perfectly willing, as I have no doubt he will be, to strike hands with those of us who say that this ought to be the declared law of the land, as well as one of the first and soundest rules of morals and honesty.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. These men, of course, if they come together in the frank capacity of sellers, to give the Government in a patriotic way the benefit of whatever information or ability they have in their respective lines of business, are doing the country a great patriotic service; but they must not put themselves in the position of acting for the Government and determining that contracts are to be given to firms in which they have an interest, either direct or indirect. The Secretary of War stated plainly to the Committee on Appropriations, unless my memory is woefully inaccurate, that the Council of National Defense said to the different departments of the Government, acting on information and advice given to them by these auxiliary committees: "You can get shoes from Thomas Cook; you had best get blankets for each one of your departments from John Jones." Then he went on to say that all the executive departments carried out those instructions. Now, if that is not these men determining in a practical way where the Government shall buy, from whom it shall purchase, and at what price, I do not know what it is or ought to be called.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator pardon me? I want first to yield to the Senator from Tennessee, who asked me to yield some time ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to make this suggestion as to the statement of the Senator from Nevada that these men are all sellers.

In the first place, if they are all sellers, I do not know why Congress should have been called upon to appropriate $500,000 to help these sellers organize to sell to the Government, or to form an arrangement by which they could sell to the Government, to the exclusion of others. In the next place, if they are nothing but sellers—if the Senator is correct in the statement that this is an organization of sellers mobilized here—then the prohibition offered in this amendment can not possibly affect them, and I do not see why any of them should object.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly. It will not do any harm at all, if they are only doing what the Senator from Nevada suggests, to adopt this amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. None whatever.

Mr. HARDWICK. And if they are doing more it ought to do it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that I have not examined the language to which he refers. I was not speaking with reference to that. All of my remarks were directed toward a proper understanding——

Mr. HARDWICK. Of what was transpiring.

Mr. NEWLANDS (continuing). Of the advisory commission.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wanted to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that when this amendment was before the committee Judge Lindsey, who was Mr. Hoover's legal adviser, suggested the proviso which is found in the bill, which reads as follows:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to prevent any such agent or employee of the Government, or any person acting in an advisory capacity, from rendering services and advice on any matter not connected with such purchase of supplies.

The committee did not want to do anything that would prevent these great business men from rendering service to the Government. It was realized that it must have their advice, and in order that there might be no question about that this proviso, out of an abundance of caution, was placed in this section. So that it leaves it, as the Senator from Georgia has so well said, that unless these men are making contracts or procuring contracts or attempting to procure contracts, this section does not affect them at all.

I do not believe anybody wants to deprive the Government of the services of these business men, whose services it must have in this time of crisis; but it is simply the common, honest proposition of not having men contract with themselves. Of course, most of these men who have been called here are honest men, and a provision of that sort ought not to injure them. It ought to protect them against the few there may be who want to combine patriotism and profit.

Mr. HARDWICK. Precisely; and therefore it was with utter astonishment that I read that some of the leading members of this commission very seriously objected to this provision. If they do object, that is all the more reason why we had better be sure to enact it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, some of the provisions of this bill—in fact, most of them—are astounding; but they are intended to meet an astounding and remarkable situation, one that has never presented itself to the country or to the world before.

It is not remarkable under these conditions that honest men, wise men, patriotic men, should disagree as to what is the best thing to do. We are traveling along a road where there are no landmarks to guide our steps. There are no blazed trees in this wilderness to tell us which way to go. There never has been a condition in the world before, for instance, where the man between the plowhandles was of equal importance with the man who carried the gun or served in the trenches. There never has been a war before where more than 30,000,000 people have left the producing ranks and have gone into the business of destroying property as well as life. So we have no precedent to guide us.

While in the main I have favored this legislation and this bill, I have realized that there was much weight in the arguments of those who are opposing it, and particularly in the arguments of those who are opposing portions of it. We are all trying to arrive at the same goal, to accomplish the same object. There are two important things we want to do. We want to increase production, and we want to control distribution. We want to give a sufficient reward to the man who produces food, and we want to prevent the manipulation of the market so that the consumer will not have to pay an exorbitant price. The war is dependent upon the production of food, and under the peculiar condition of things our own country must bear the great bulk of the burden of the production of those foods. It is not remarkable, therefore, that we should find under those conditions that the old law of supply and demand to a great extent has been repealed. It will do no good, Mr. President, for us to denounce the food speculator unless we take some action to prevent him from carrying on his nefarious business in these critical times. The objects the framers of this bill had in mind, I think, was to stimulate production and to provide for fair distribution. We must do those two things. In order to do them we must take some extraordinary steps, steps that no legislature has ever taken before.

I confess that under any ordinary conditions there is very little in this bill that would meet with my approval. It may be that mistakes have been made; the legislation to a great extent is experimental; but we must meet a condition, and it seems to me that we are called upon to do something that will remedy that situation.

Now, it is thought best, in order to stimulate production, for instance, to provide that there shall be power given by which a minimum price shall be fixed and guaranteed by the Government to those who produce food. The people of the country, in the main, are patriotic. All classes of our people desire that we should be successful in the war, however much they may have regretted that we went into it or opposed our going into it. But when we call upon the farmers of the country to raise an extraordinary crop to meet an extraordinary condition under circumstances that make it expensive and very difficult for them to increase the operations on account of the increased cost of the things that they must buy and the lack of labor that the very war itself makes imminent, so that they can not avoid it, it is but fair that we should say to these people that we will guarantee to you, if you will produce abundantly, a certain price. That price ought to be large enough to cover all possible costs of production, together with a reasonable profit. The farmer ought not to be compelled to go to an extraordinary length, because he does not know but that by the sudden ending of the war or other causes he may produce an abundant crop that will not pay for the expense and the labor of producing it.

On the other hand, Mr. President, when we do that we are bound, I think, to take into consideration the interest of the consumer. We must see that he is not compelled to pay a price that is exorbitant for the things that he has to eat and the things that he has to wear and for the fuel that keeps him warm.

We have found some astounding conditions existing, and I want to call the attention of the Senate to some of them briefly, some conditions that are remarkable when it comes to the high cost of living. It is getting now to be the wonder of the day how millions of our people live. Men who a few years ago were receiving a salary that was almost a luxury are now practically paupers, unable to support themselves and those dependent upon them. We can not win this war if our people are suffering from hunger and shivering with cold. We must provide some method by which the bulk and mass of the great common people will be protected from these exorbitant prices.

I do not believe it is necessary to produce evidence to convince anybody that a condition exists which, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] said, has practically paralyzed the ancient law of supply and demand. People must have food. It is useless to talk about the cause, the reason why they are hungry and do not have enough to eat, if the fact is that they do not have enough to eat. It is useless to say that this or that is to blame for the high cost of clothing if the people are unable to buy clothing. We must bring about a condition that will make this suffering impossible. To do that it will be necessary to take extraordinary measures, as this bill does.

I read a dispatch from a Chicago paper of the 25th of May. This is what the mayor of Chicago said:

UNDERFED DIE IN CHICAGO—MAYOR BLAMES HIGH PRICES OF NECESSARIES FOR 1,500 DEATHS.

CHICAGO, May 25.

More than 1,500 died in Chicago this year because they were "undernourished and underclothed," declared Mayor Thompson to-day.

"Prices have been so high that people have been denying themselves the necessities of life."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there a further statement about the comparative quantity of garbage cans?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I read all that is contained in the dispatch.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the same interview I have, and it contains also the reason why he thinks there is undernourishment and more deaths, because there were 500 tons of garbage in a preceding period and only 300 tons in the latter period, and he inferred that the people have been eating 200 tons of garbage. That is in the same interview. I have the entire interview. He inferred that they died by consuming garbage, it seems.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that the best of food if not consumed and kept will become garbage. In fact, one of the things that the bill undertakes, at least indirectly, to do is to prevent good food from becoming garbage. In other words, the people must be taught and must learn and must practice economy in everything pertaining to food. There is enough garbage thrown out from some of the homes to feed thousands of children and poor people in other homes, and feed them in the best possible manner.

I notice an article of July 2, taken from a Washington paper, which has this heading:

CORNER CANNED GOODS—"MIDDLEMEN" EARNING A PROFIT OF 100 PER CENT, DATA SHOWS—PRICES DOUBLE IN SIX MONTHS—OBTAIN MORE THAN DO PRODUCERS AND THE RETAILERS COMBINED—CONDITION EXISTS, UNITED STATES FIGURES DISCLOSE, WHILE CROP IS ABOVE NORMAL—TABLES OF WASHINGTON HOMES SUFFER.

Facts and figures which are easily accessible to Herbert Hoover, national food administrator, or to any other Government official, show that the so-called "middle man," who in this instance is apparently the wholesale grocer, is exacting a profit of 100 per cent on the canned vegetables that are eaten in the homes of Washington.

The wholesaler's profit, the figures demonstrate, on canned tomatoes, corn, peas, and other staples more than equals the combined compensation and profits of the producer of the vegetables, the manufacturer who cans them, and the grocer who retails them to the consumers.

PRICES HAVE BEEN DOUBLED.

This condition is permitted to exist, too, when this season's supply of these vegetables is above normal and when fresh vegetables are as abundant for table use as in any recent previous year.

Within six months the retail price of vegetables in cans has more than doubled.

Recently some significant information was obtained by the Federal Trade Commission. It made an investigation as to prices received by 2,000 canners throughout the United States.

FIGURES OBTAINED SURPRISE.

The results of the investigation, when compared to the price lists of wholesale grocers in this city, are of the nature of an astonishing revelation.

It is shown, for instance, that quart cans of tomatoes and peas, which have been sold by the canner to the wholesaler at a rate of $1.10 a dozen, are sold by the wholesaler to the retailer at $2.26 a dozen. The wholesaler's profit, less transportation charges, is $1.16.

CONTRACT FOR WHOLE OUTPUT.

Practically the entire output of the canning factories of the United States for this year's pack, the trade commission ascertained through its inquiry, has been contracted for by the wholesalers.

The contract price for tomatoes and peas is $1.10 a dozen cans and for corn it is 90 cents a dozen cans.

The commission discovered also that a large part of the canned goods now being sold at elevated prices is last year's pack, and was sold by the canners at considerably lower prices than now prevail under the new contract.

HAS FIGURES FOR HOOVER.

All of this information is available to the Government authorities. The Federal Trade Commission has a mass of facts and figures which it is anxious to turn over to Mr. Hoover at the asking.

It would be a simple matter for the officers of the Government to obtain the price lists of wholesale grocers and jobbers. Also, it would not be difficult to obtain figures as to transportation from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

WHERE THE BLAME LIES.

Experts who have studied the high cost of living problem traced the trouble partially to the transportation system. But it is considered by them that it is unthinkable that a 100 per cent profit on canned goods could be absorbed to any great extent by transportation.

Mr. President, right on that point as applying to the Capital City here, I wish to read an article I clipped from a paper to-day in which these remarkable statements are made:

Gamblers' grip on Center Market—

That is the principal market, as we all know, in the city of Washington—

GAMBLERS' GRIP ON CENTER MARKET—FOOD PRICES FIXED BY MANIPULATORS WHO ARE KNOWN AS FARMERS' AGENTS—"EARLY BIRDS" THEY ARE CALLED, AND METHOD IS TO "CORNER" PRODUCE AS IT ARRIVES—VIRTUALLY DICTATE TO RETAILERS, WHO IN TURN MAKE PUBLIC PAY—OPERATE WITHOUT LICENSE—PRODUCERS AT A DISADVANTAGE.

Gamblers and manipulators, who conduct their operations daily in the vicinity of the Center Market, practically control the fresh vegetable situation in Washington. Performing no economic service to the public, fearless of the law, for they think there is no law that can touch them, these men in many cases actually dictate the prices that shall be paid by the consumers in this city of farm products brought here for marketing.

Some of these men call themselves farmers' agents. A few are licensed commission men, but in reality are only produce merchants, for they buy and sell outright with no pretense at assessing a commission. Their profits are said to be unreasonable in comparison with the profits made by the producer and the retailer.

OPERATE WITHOUT LICENSE.

The co-called farmers' agents operate without license from the District. They are unidentified in many instances. They make it a practice of arriving early at the market, about the time the shipments from the farms begin to arrive. "Early birds," they are called. They make a survey of the produce arrivals and then proceed to institute a kind of monopoly on anything in which there appears to be a shortage.

With the entire supply in their hands when the retail dealers reach the market, the farmers' agents are in a position to abrogate the law of supply and demand and exact a price which, in their judgment, is the limit the market will stand.

When all kinds of farm produce is plentiful these men find the market "poor picking." But on days when there is a scarcity of produce they make a "killing."

I ask leave to insert the balance of the article without reading as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WATCH THEIR CHANCE TO "CORNER."

If, for instance, 50 crates of cultivated blackberries and 50 crates of raspberries constitute the entire supply of those fruits brought to the market on a single morning, the farmers' agents quickly buy it all.

"Why, it is all bought up before 4 o'clock in the morning," said a retail merchant yesterday. "And this happens with anything that is scarce."

The retail merchants and the commission merchants, too, then must buy from the agents, and at the agents' prices.

The Washington market for fresh farm products is a very fluctuating market. The speculators and manipulators have taken advantage of this condition. It furnishes a field for their operations that would not be possible in a well-stocked and steady market.

Washington has a population of 360,000 persons. It is not a manufacturing city. Baltimore, a near neighbor, has a population twice that of Washington. Baltimore is a manufacturing center. Wholesalers, jobbers, and commission merchants in this city are careful not to buy a larger stock of perishable foodstuffs than the trade will readily consume. It they did, they soon would find themselves at big financial loss through the condemnation of goods that have become unfit for consumption. Baltimore, on the other hand, has a market handy for all the surplus stock of its wholesalers, jobbers, and commission merchants. The factories buy the surplus, at a slightly lower figure probably than the current wholesale price, and it is put up in cans and soon is ready again for the retail trade.

It is these conditions, say local market experts, that have given rise to the scheme of market speculation that has Washington in its grasp.

WHOLESALE METHODS PUZZLE FARMERS.

Then, too, it is pointed out by the experts, there is a slipshod method of wholesaling in vogue in Washington. It is a method that is never the same on two successive days. The farmers who have products to market here are mystified by it. Through experience they are dissatisfied to come here. And here, again, has Baltimore profited.

The shippers, knowing that the Baltimore market is steady and regular, have diverted their shipments to that city.

A market, therefore, which by circumstances and by mismanagement has curtailed the field from which it must draw the foodstuffs that are its stock in trade, has become a Mecca for small speculators and manipulators—for the "early birds."

One farmer decided to try the experiment of selling direct to the retail grocer. He found that the grocer, when in need of any of the products the farmer had on his wagon, was glad to take advantage of the lower prices that could be obtained in this way. But the farmer was not always successful in disposing of all the vegetables he had brought to town. Sometimes he found the market glutted. So he gave up the plan and went back to the commission merchant.

REJECTED BY COMMISSION MEN.

"Oh, no," the commission merchant told him, "you can't sell to us while you are selling also to the retail trade. You must bring all of your stuff here or else none of it."

Talk to the retail men in Center Market and they will admit that on many of the foodstuffs they sell to the public the prices are high, out of all proportion. Few of them, however, care to furnish an analysis of the situation, though when pressed they will say that somewhere between the producer and themselves a big profit is being made by a "middleman."

"It is difficult to say who is getting the larger share of the profits," said a retailer yesterday. "But one thing is certain, the retail men are not making any money."

They shake their heads doubtfully when the suggestion is made that a remedy might be found in a municipal wholesale market for foodstuffs. It would not be practicable for the Government to conduct a business of that character, they say.

High officials in the District government are of the opinion that the solution of the problem is in a wholesale market, and it is probable that Congress will receive a recommendation along that line soon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I wish to state to the Senator, apropos of what he has just read, that I have had some investigations recently made in the city of Washington with a view to determining whether or not there is a monopoly or trust controlling the retailers in the disposition of farm products. I introduced a few days ago a resolution calling for an investigation and for the restoration to the Government, if possible, of the market now occupied by a large number of retailers. From what I can learn it has been held by a corporation which claim title, and many of the people of the District labor under the impression that this market is controlled by the Government, and wonder why it is that such extortionate prices are permitted to be charged in a market which they suppose is owned by the District. I wish to say to the Senator that if the District Committee can be induced to act upon the resolution an investigation soon will be made with respect to the causes of the extortion practiced in this city upon the part of the retailers.

Mr. NORRIS. I sincerely trust the committee may act in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know whether this is apropos to what the Senator is talking about or not, but it occurred to me while he has been talking that there ought to be some pretty reliable information available to the Senate especially. As I understand it, the Senate is running the restaurant downstairs here, and it seems to me that the committee having charge of it ought to be able to furnish us some very valuable information with reference to wholesale prices and retail prices and all the elements that make up the ultimate cost to the consumer. I was wondering whether the Senator had made any inquiries of the Committee on Rules, or whatever committee is in charge of the restaurant?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I have not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does it not occur to the Senator that that committee ought to be able to furnish us some pretty valuable information touching the question of the cost of living?

Mr. NORRIS. It had not occurred to me before. It may be that that suggestion is worthy of consideration.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Just as one illustration, I notice that we can get one roasting ear for 15 cents down here in the restaurant.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be interesting to know how much the farmer who brought it in got for the roasting ear?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I take it that they buy the corn at wholesale prices. I would like to know how many transactions there are before we have to pay 15 cents, and the various increases along to make it up. It seems to me that we might get some very valuable information, something that would be rather authoritative.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while a large number of the people called the middle class and down are suffering severely from conditions, and naturally are made discontented, there are other classes of our people who are making more money than they have ever made. Such a condition brings dissatisfaction. Such a condition is the very worst that could possibly be in existence when we are fighting a war and want our people to be united.

Here is an editorial I have clipped from one of the leading newspapers. It reads as follows:

That the people may have a better idea of these things—

Which it had been considering, the profits of large corporations—

we call attention to the fact that the net profits of the Armour Packing Co. rose between 1913 and 1916 from $6,000,000 to $20,000,000.

That is a company engaged in supplying food to the people of the United States. Every family practically in the United States has to pay tribute to that institution.

Then make note of the fact that the Swift Packing Co.'s—

Another one engaged in the same kind of business—

Then make note of the fact that the Swift Packing Co.'s profit in the same time rose from $9 000,000 to $20,000,000—

Everybody must contribute to that, the poor as well as the rich.

The Central Leather Co.'s from $4,000,000 to $15,000,000—

Another one.

The United Fruit Co.'s from $5,000,000 to $11,000,000—

Another company engaged in the food business.

And those of the United States Steel Corporation from $81,000,000 to $271,000,000.

That certainly was bad enough up to 1916, but all the above corporations are making larger profits in 1917 than ever before.

If the American people are going to stand for dividends all the way from 50 to 200 per cent, then they should not complain about the high cost of living.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENDRICK. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows that many of the companies which he has enumerated are only subsidiary companies of the packing interest and are under the direction of those companies? Those parent institutions are in control of nearly every other line of industry that is at all incidental to that line.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, all these companies, either directly or indirectly, are supplying products that practically all the people of the United States have to pay for and have to use in their business; they can not live without them. Under the stress of war conditions, with the ordinary rule of supply and demand abandoned, it is necessary, in my judgment—and I think that is one of the main objects of this bill—that the Government should put its strong hand upon every man, every firm, and every corporation engaged in handling food and see that robbery is not committed. It seems to me these figures practically demonstrate that between the time the food leaves the producer and the time it reaches the consumer there have been too many men who have taken a large and unreasonable profit as the produce passes along its road.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does it not apply to everything just the same?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it does, but particularly to the people interested in the things they must eat and in the things they must wear.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. Has the Senator had an estimate made of the increase in the cost of living this year as compared with last year?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I have seen an estimate; I can not give it from memory.

Mr. CALDER. The Department of Labor estimates that between April this year and April last year there has been an increase of about 25 per cent. I inquired of them what the increase of wages amounted to, and they said approximately 15 per cent. So the cost of living has increased on an average 25 per cent and of wages approximately 15 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

Now, Mr. President, I want to read briefly from a statement made by Mr. Vrooman, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture. I take it from a Washington newspaper of some time ago. In part the article reads as follows:

Assistant Secretary Vrooman, of the Department of Agriculture, who has just returned from a tour on which he observed the food situation, declared in a statement last night he had seen much hardship and suffering, especially among the poor, because of the "crime being perpetrated against the American people by the control of food prices by disloyal food pirates."

"Everywhere I have found a growing feeling that there must soon come a reckoning with these manipulators of the Nation's food supply," said he—

And so on.

Mr. President, I have two articles here clipped from newspapers showing where the Chicago Board of Trade themselves took occasion to limit the maximum price of corn on the Chicago Board of Trade. I ask that they be printed as a part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MAXIMUM CORN PRICE FIXED TO PREVENT SPECULATION.

Fearing a repetition of the wild upturns in prices that characterized the wheat market before maximum value was fixed, directors of the board of trade yesterday decided to limit the corn market in about the same way.

At a special meeting it was decided to fix a maximum price on all deliveries of corn at $1.65, and it will be considered a grave offense for any member to make any contracts in excess of that figure. The decision was reached after a long discussion.

WARN AGAINST OFFENSE.

The directors adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That on and after Wednesday, June 6, 1917, until further notice, members of this board, in making contracts for the purchase or for the sale, by grade alone, of corn to be delivered in store, either for immediate or future delivery, shall not, in entering into such contracts, exceed the price of $1.65; be it further

"Resolved, That any member trading in violation of the foregoing shall be deemed to have committed a grave offense against the good name of the institution."

SUPPORT WILSON POLICY.

"I wish to announce that the directors were prompted in taking the action they did by purely preventive reasons," said J. P. Griffin, president of the board of trade, last night. "While it is a fact that governments and consumers are liberal buyers of corn for present and future delivery, there is no indication that this buying has reached proportions that might result in unduly enhancing values.

"It is the policy of the administration at Washington to prevent the price of foodstuffs reaching an abnormally high level. The action of our directorate to-day is simply in support of the policy of President Wilson and his advisers."

July corn sold at $1.50 yesterday, an advance of about 14 cents from the extreme low price reached a few days ago, while September touched $1.37. Both months reacted sharply on the announcement the directors were to consider establishing a maximum price.

STOCKS NOW ARE SMALL.

Stocks of corn in store at Chicago and at other points are extremely small, and with the car supply limited, cash corn handlers do not look for enough corn to come in to make any appreciable supply available for delivery on contracts. As a result, July shorts at least were in about the same position as were the shorts in wheat.

Traders were of the opinion that big advances were possible in case of a general stampede of the shorts.

Wheat futures advanced sharply. July wheat closed 9 cents higher, while September was up 4 cents.

[From the Washington Post, July 12, 1917.]

CHICAGO PUTS CURB ON PRICE OF CORN—LIMIT OF $1.28 SET FOR DECEMBER AND MAY DELIVERIES.

Directors of the Chicago Board of Trade this afternoon fixed a maximum price of $1.28 for the December and May, 1918, deliveries of corn. No action was taken as to September corn.

In taking such a measure the directors were said to feel that more drastic steps were averted, including the possible closing of the board of trade. It was said that, owing to the smallness of stocks of corn at present and the unlikelihood that any large accumulations would be available for a long time to come, the trade in future options had much less substantial basis than under normal conditions, so that dangers of sudden wild inflations of value had to be taken into account.

Only the options of the new 1917 crop were dealt with in to-day's action of the Chicago Board of Trade directors. A maximum price of $1.65 for the September delivery here and for all other old crop future was already in effect and was not disturbed, as the value of old corn for immediate delivery was now much in excess of that limit and had to-day touched the highest figures ever known for Chicago—$1.91½ a bushel for ordinary No. 2 white.

KANSAS CITY, MO., July 11.

Trading in September corn by members of the Kansas City Board of Trade is discontinued, except to close existing contracts, according to a resolution announced to-day by the board of directors. No change is made in the maximum price of $1.62 previously established.

ST. LOUIS, MO., July 11.

The directors of the St. Louis Merchants' Exchange to-day declared all trading in September corn off except where necessary to close contracts. The maximum price at which contracts are to be closed was fixed at $1.67. The directors also fixed the value of June corn at $1.70.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me this demonstrates that even those who are in the business see the necessity of taking some steps which shall prevent speculation in food products. Is it any worse that the Government itself should take a hand, either in fixing a minimum price or in a regulation that would prevent those who have gotten hold of the food products from demanding of the consumer too much, than it is to permit the people themselves who are speculating and dealing in those food products to fix a price proposed for their own protection, for fear that they might be put out of business if they did not? I wish to refer briefly again to the canned-goods situation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator leaves that branch I should like to ask him if he has made any comparison between the advance in the price of food products compared with the advance in the price of ordinary clothing and products of every kind? I refer now to the retail price. I have not examined it within the last few months, but up to within a few months ago the retail prices of clothing of all character had advanced far in excess of the advance in the retail cost of food products. So if those who produce these food products are receiving more than ordinary profit, it must be remembered that they are paying more for the things that they purchase. I have looked to find out where the particular poor class the Senator speaks of are located. I find among the classes in our great cities that are regarded and very generally referred to as the poor class have a greater amount of money to their credit in the savings banks to-day than they ever had before; and if you attempted to hire one of those people to do a little work you would be surprised to ascertain the fact that they do not care very much whether they work or not, because they can get all the work they wish at very high prices.

But there is one class, if the Senator will allow me, that I think are feeling the pinch of the high prices of both food products and clothing, and those are the clerks throughout all the departments and in every line of business. Their wages have not gone up to compare either with the laborers' wages that produce the things they must purchase nor have their wages gone up to meet the demand of the higher prices for food products.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in the last statement the Senator has made I agree with him fully.

There are, however, in addition to that class, millions of people who are beginning to feel and who have for some time felt the burdens of the high cost of living. I do not have the testimony here, because I did not anticipate going into the subject, but I have listened to the testimony of men who have been investigating, and the testimony has been most remarkably startling, where we had the bread riot in New York and the bread riot in Philadelphia.

I refer to the men who are getting salaries now, for instance, in Philadelphia. While I can not give the figures, I remember the testimony of one of the professors of the University of Pennsylvania, who was appointed by the mayor of Philadelphia to make the investigation. He gave us some remarkable facts showing that people there—the poorer class of people—had formed a sort of a mob and made an attack on some of the grocery stores, taking food by force. The commission appointed by the mayor made an investigation which showed the per cent the cost of living in Philadelphia had risen during the year; how much increase there had been in the wages of the various classes of the people—clerks, laborers, and so forth—and it was a remarkable thing that, while the cost of labor had gone up, while the men who were working in the various mills and factories were receiving higher wages, the increase had not gone up nearly as rapidly as had the cost of living. So it was almost impossible for men getting salaries from $50 to $150 a month, with the ordinary family of wife and children to support, to make both ends meet.

I think we can observe that as a matter of our own knowledge. I know I am acquainted with a great many cases, where men are getting salaries of from $100 to $200 a month, who would be absolutely put in the poorhouse if sickness occurred in their families.

I want to read from the report of the committee on the high cost of living in the District of Columbia which was made last January or February, and which was put into the RECORD by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. I want to repeat just a little of what he then read. I now read from the report of the committee:

Interesting figures were obtained from the proprietors of some of the smaller stores, whose business is with the poorer people. They show clearly that the poor have been compelled to resort to the strictest economy in order to provide food, on account of high prices. Their purchases are of the cheapest possible articles and in smaller quantities than heretofore. The sale of ordinary cuts of meat in this class of stores seems to have been discontinued, and the meat now purchased consists of hog livers, hog kidneys, neck bones, hog faces, etc.

Further on the committee says:

In the opinion of the committee the element of speculation in food products has been one of the potent factors in the enormous increase in prices which consumers have been compelled to pay.

Mr. President, the Vice President of the United States the other day put into the RECORD a report of the grand jury of Chicago, where an investigation was made with, I presume, a view of indicting some of the people who are engaged in this character of business. I confess it has seemed to me all the time that a great deal of this work of food speculation has been contrary to the Sherman antitrust law, and I have wondered, from some of the testimony which has been given to the committee, why prosecutions have not taken place. It seems to me there could be no escape, if the testimony was true, from a conviction in case an indictment were found. From the report of this grand jury made to the Federal judge in Chicago it almost seems to me that at least a prima facie case is made as to a criminal violation of the Sherman antitrust law by the facts which the committee report. I am not going to read it all. I want to read a part of it, however. The grand jury go into detail in a great many respects, but I want to read a part of what they state about canned goods. I do that not because it is any exception from the balance of the report but because it relates to something which comes into every home. Everybody who has a family to provide for has to purchase canned goods.

These goods are not classed as perishable—

Says the report—

These goods are not classed as perishable, and do not require cold storage. Canners of vegetables usually dispose of their product by future sales before the vegetables are grown or canning operations begin. The goods get to the consumer through brokers, wholesalers, jobbers, and retailers. The canners, brokers, wholesalers, and jobbers have associations, which select committees whose function is to meet together at intervals. The canners, wholesalers, and jobbers have devised some means for insuring complete cooperation among themselves—which results in keeping the canner from dealing directly with the consumer or with the retailer. Wholesalers and jobbers will not buy from canners, in most cases, otherwise than through brokers. If retailers attempt to resist the combination by purchasing directly from the canner, they find it difficult or impossible to do any further business with the wholesalers or jobbers as to other groceries.

It seems to me that is a violation of the law right there—

This situation compels the consumer to pay the expense of maintaining these middlemen; and in times like the present, when an unusual demand for food products exists and is likely to continue, these middlemen exert the power that inheres in this system to extort unconscionable profits from consumers, with no proportionate benefit to those who furnish the principal service, to wit, the farmers, canners, and such retailers as are satisfied with a reasonable profit above the cost.

To illustrate the foregoing, we cite the increase of the price of canned tomatoes and corn in passing through the hands of those middlemen during the past year:

Canned tomatoes were sold by the canners in the spring of 1916, through brokers, for future delivery, to wholesalers and jobbers, at 90 cents per dozen cans. These same tomatoes are being sold to-day by wholesalers and jobbers to retailers at $2.25 and more per dozen, and consumers are now getting one can for 25 cents instead of the two or three cans they got for that sum prior to this season. Cans and labels, being furnished by the canners, do not enter into this increase in cost in the hands of the middlemen.

Canned corn, which was sold in 1916 by the canner to the wholesaler and jobber at 65 cents per dozen, is selling to the retailer at $1.75 per dozen and the consumer is paying a proportionately high price.

In view of this situation in the canned-goods trade, and of the existence of similar conditions in the trade in other food products and necessaries, we urge the passage of laws to eliminate these conditions and to reduce prices to a normal basis as soon as possible.

Furthermore, in consequence of these conditions, brokers, wholesalers, and jobbers are in a position to, and many of them do, hoard up, speculate in, and demand excessive prices for these commodities; and no doubt they are in the same position with reference to many of the other necessaries of life handled by them.

Later on this grand jury in the same report say something else about the wholesalers of food products, as follows:

Some wholesalers and jobbers in food products urge retailers to advance prices to the consumer—advising them to put on higher prices, which gives the wholesaler a basis for charging higher prices to the retailer. To illustrate, one of the largest wholesale dealers in Chicago sent out a circular to its salesmen containing the following paragraphs:

"Our customers, in particular, have very unusual profits within their grasp at this moment. 'Will they throw them away or tuck them away?'

"Jobbers are affected; they are financially interested. They urge that the greatest haul yet made by the retail grocery world be converted into tangible assets. Wholesale houses are not legally appointed custodians or guardians for anybody, but they do have an interest at this time, one that is definable and that must be apparent to all.

"Of what earthly use are 'futures' if the benefits are wantonly wasted?

"No man ever got very far on the road to competency who was a wise buyer but a spineless seller.

"Will the grocer who has long lamented the scantiness of his profits let up now long enough to bring in the heaping basket left on his doorstep?

"Our representatives should make themselves heard at once on this readjusting of retail prices."

That was a letter which was sent out to retailers by a wholesale dealer in the city of Chicago. Here is part of another one:

Raise your prices now on everything we have advised you will advance.

Mr. President, I have an extract from a letter of an acquaintance of mine who is now and has been in the employ of one of the leading railroads of the Northwest for more than 25 years. I do not feel at liberty to use his name, although in his letter he said nothing in regard to that. I hardly know why he wrote me, but from his letter I have taken a quotation that I want to read to the Senate. I know him to be able, honest, conscientious, patriotic, and fearless, and a man who, while he is in the employ and has been in the employ for a great many years of a great railroad corporation and is loyal to it in every way, at the same time has a feeling in his heart that something ought to be done under present conditions to relieve the situation as it faces the ordinary consumer. He says:

When potatoes were almost unobtainable last winter, at Franklin Park, a small station near Chicago, there were at one time more than 60 cars on the track, that had been there for more than 30 days, and all paying demurrage.

He is speaking of something that he knows about, because it is a part of his business to know.

In addition to that, every warehouse along the Soo line was filled to the roof.

That line runs through Wisconsin, one of the greatest potato-producing countries that there is anywhere in the world, and at every station through the potato country there are a great number of immense storehouses used for the purpose of storing potatoes.

Again, it does not make me feel like depriving myself any more than I am now, to read that 1914 was the most successful year for industries and that the profits of the United States Steel Co. went from over $23,000,000 that year to over $271,000,000 in 1917; Armour & Co. from $7,000,000 to $20,000,000; Du Pont Powder Co. from $4,000,000 to $82,000,000. And I might go on indefinitely. However, such things do not encourage the sale of liberty bonds.

That letter was written at the time the campaign was on to sell liberty bonds.

Mr. President, it is announced that if this bill is passed—and I presume it will pass in some form—Mr. Hoover will be appointed by the President to have charge, in the main, of the various activities that will be provided for in the bill. I think anyone who has come in contact with Mr. Hoover as he has appeared before the committees and at other times before the public or who has been brought in contact with him in any other way must be impressed not only with the man's ability but with his honesty; and I am induced to support some of the provisions of this bill which under ordinary circumstances I would not vote for by the fact that I understand Mr. Hoover is going to be appointed to carry them out. I do not believe there is a better equipped man in the world for that place than Mr. Hoover. I am satisfied——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I dislike to interrupt the Senator while he is speaking of the good qualities of Mr. Hoover, and I want to assure him that I have just as high respect for Mr. Hoover as has the Senator from Nebraska; but does the Senator from Nebraska really believe that Mr. Hoover knows as much about agriculture as some other men in the United States?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not; and Mr. Hoover certainly would not claim that knowledge.

Mr. GRONNA. That is what he will have to deal with.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; he will have to deal with that, but he also will have to deal with a great many other things. There is not a man living, and there never will be a man living, who will be able to know about all of the things that are controlled and handled by this bill. I do not think there is any doubt of that. I have no doubt, either, that Mr. Hoover is just as anxious to protect, and will just as sincerely protect, the farmers of the country as he would protect anybody else. I think he realizes as fully as any man can that the success of his undertaking, the success of this proposed law, if it shall be inaugurated, and the success of our country in this war, if we are successful, depend more upon the farmer than upon any other one element. He must be protected.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon another interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield again to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator will remember that before the Committee on Agriculture it was stated that the only products which the allies require are the products of the farm, and especially wheat. Does the Senator believe that it is the intention of the director, no matter who he may be, whether Mr. Hoover or anyone else, seriously to consider the fixing of prices of anything except farm products?

Mr. NORRIS. My own idea is that, unless conditions should change by the developments of the war, there would not be any occasion to fix a minimum price—and that is the only kind of price that can be fixed directly—on anything except wheat. I have heard Senators suggest that we ought to fix in the bill itself a minimum price for wheat, and I am not sure that that would be the better thing to do, although it seems to me there are so many contingencies that might arise that would make it necessary to change that price, perhaps when Congress is not in session, that I doubt somewhat the wisdom of doing it by direct legislative act. I hope it will not become necessary to fix any other minimum price than that. I do not believe there is any intention of doing so now; but conditions may arise and there may come a time when it will be necessary to fix the minimum price of some other essential products.

Mr. GRONNA. Suppose we do fix the price of wheat, and suppose we make the price of wheat exceedingly low, does the Senator believe that that will remedy the evils complained of growing out of the high cost of living?

Mr. NORRIS. No; and it is not Mr. Hoover's idea to fix the price exceedingly low. He wants to fix it so as to resolve every doubt in favor of the producer. If there is any fixing, high or low about it, he would fix it exceedingly high. He would fix it so as to take in every possible cost of production, and provide a profit on top of that.

Mr. GRONNA. Has the Senator made any comparison as to the relative value of wheat and wheat flour and other food products, and the cost thereof?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I have not made any comparison, but I have seen a great many comparisons. I think the Senator himself gave some very valuable figures as to the comparative prices, for instance, of flour and wheat; and I have listened to Mr. Hoover also, when he has given some comparative figures on that score.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not a well-known fact that wheat and flour and bread even to-day are the cheapest articles of food in the country?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, no; I do not think that is a well-known fact. I listened to some figures that the Senator himself gave the other day, from which I thought he demonstrated pretty fully that the price of flour, according to the price of wheat, was higher than it ought to be.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think that the Senator from Nebraska understands my colleague. He is considering relative food values. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not flour itself is not the cheapest food product there is in the United States to-day?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, Mr. President, I do not know whether it is not, but that is perfectly immaterial so far as this bill is concerned. It is one of the principal food products, and even if it is cheaper than anything else, if it is still too high, it ought to be cheapened. It does not make any difference whether it is cheaper than anything else or not.

Mr. McCUMBER. How is it to be determined whether any one article is too high? By what standard of measurement would that fact be determined? If the Senator will put himself upon record as to any other one commodity produced in the United States, I will demonstrate to him in a minute that flour is not only not too high, but that, at $15 a barrel, it is still the cheapest thing that can be purchased in the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean by that that he thinks flour ought to advance in price from what it is now? Does he think it is too cheap?

Mr. McCUMBER. Compared with the labor that produces the raw material that the producer of flour has to purchase, I say that flour to-day is cheaper than it ought to be.

Mr. NORRIS. Now——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. If we were to give to the producers of grain the same amount for their labor, hour for hour, that we give to other producers in the United States who are engaged in equally intelligent forms of labor, then still there is a vastly lower price for flour than for anything else that is produced by human labor.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me ask the Senator again, does he believe that the price of flour now, as compared to the price of wheat, is too high or too low?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we can not hear the figures that the Senator mentions, and I am anxious to hear them.

Mr. McCUMBER. As compared with the present price of wheat, the price of flour is not greatly out of proportion. As compared with the price at which the bulk of the crop was sold by the farmer at an earlier period, it is decidedly out of proportion and too high. In other words, there is too much of a difference between the price paid for the wheat and the price for which flour is now selling.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator in answering that question, I think, has got at what the object of this bill, in the main, is. Between the producer and the consumer there is too great variance in prices. The Senator says the price received by most of the producers of wheat as compared with the price of flour now makes a variation that is too great. One of the objects of this legislation is to take away, if possible, some of the great differences between the producer and the consumer that are not necessary in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. McCUMBER. But let me correct the Senator right there.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from North Dakota, and then I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me correct the Senator, because we want to be fair. When the farmer was selling his 1916 crop of wheat for a price which I think has been estimated as $1.51 a bushel, flour was not so high in price as it is now.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. McCUMBER. There was a fair difference between the farmer's price and the flour price; but after the farmer got rid of his crop, then many considerations came into being that raised the price of wheat, and flour went up, even though the first purchaser of the wheat that went into that flour did not pay a price for it that would warrant the present price of flour.

If the Senator will allow me a word further, it is just the same as the case of a merchant who purchases a stock of goods when they are cheap. Suddenly, within a month or two, they treble in price, and the merchant immediately raises the price of the whole consignment of goods he has.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. And sells them all upon that advanced price. That is just what the flour dealers are doing to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course there is nobody who has disputed that. I do not think anybody has contended otherwise. Flour has gone up in accordance with the way wheat went up, but that does not do away with the fact that the majority of the men who produced the wheat sold it before it went up.

I am not complaining of the miller; I am not making any charge against the miller; I practically have no charge to make against anyone.

These people are getting all they can for what they can sell, and I presume everyone would do that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield. I think it was illustrated the other day by a letter the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] read from a coal operator, who said, in substance, that the operators were getting fabulous and outrageous prices for their coal, but he said, "We can not help it; there are men ready to pay it; and everybody else is charging the same price." It will never help the poor washerwoman who has to buy coal to say that there was no competition in coal and that somebody else would have paid the same price charged to her. She eventually pays it. The condition that exists, though it comes about naturally, must have, I believe, some remedy, and it is the object of this bill to provide a remedy. It may not do so, but I hope it will.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield now to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think that nine-tenths of the trouble now confronting us arises from an entire misunderstanding of terms and of a few fundamental facts. The Senator from Nebraska represents a great agricultural State, and the Senator from Nebraska is a perfectly fair man. I do not always agree with his conclusions, but I do agree with his fairness; and so I want to see if we can not get at one or two facts here through the medium of a colloquy.

The Senator says that he wants to eliminate speculative prices between the producer of agricultural products and the consumer. Now, let me ask him, in the first place, what he means by the "consumer"? Does he mean the ordinary citizen who buys at retail, or does he mean the retail merchant, having in mind the prices paid by him? We must get at that point to get anywhere.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I mean both of them.

Mr. REED. Of course, we will not get anywhere if we do not consider it seriously. I really am serious about trying to arrive at it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am serious, too; I am answering the Senator seriously, and I think I realize what the Senator is leading up to. So far as this bill is concerned, it eliminates the retailer.

Mr. REED. Let me say——

Mr. NORRIS. Just let me refer to that for a moment. In theory, at least, we ought to go beyond the retailer. In practice, however, it would perhaps be an impossibility, because there are so many of them and this machinery is going to be complicated, anyhow; it is going to be top-heavy; and we shall have to confine ourselves to that portion of the distance between the producer and the consumer that is measured on the far side of the retailer, not, perhaps, because we want to do so, but because of the very necessity of the case.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that gives us a starting point. The Senator proposes to eliminate whatever profits or extra charges may be made by the retailer, because he recognizes the fact that it is impracticable to regulate the profits of the retailer. I say now, for the sake of clarity, that it is impossible to do that unless you deal with every particular case by itself, because the profits of a groceryman who is renting a storeroom and paying $1,500 a month rent or $2,000 a month rent must be different than the profits that are necessary for the groceryman who is paying $100 a month rent. The prices that must be charged by a man who delivers to a little local neighborhood must be or may be different than the prices charged by a man who delivers several miles from his store. So that each one of the retailers must be taken by himself, and therefore the necessity of eliminating them.

Now, I want to ask the Senator if he does not know that it is true that fully 50 per cent of the increase of price between the producer and the ultimate consumer is added in the retail institution?

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that is true. I know quite a large part of it is added by the retailer.

Mr. REED. Yes. So we have now already eliminated from the equation one-half of these alleged speculative profits, and we are not going to be able to reach them, whether they are just or unjust. I add at this point that it is perfectly absurd to say that there can be any combination between the numerous grocery stores and meat markets of a town under ordinary circumstances, and that if one should get his price much too high the others would speedily cut into the trade.

Now let us go to the next point.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe that kind of a combination would be possible, but as a practical proposition it is a good deal like the farmers combining; it is not practicable.

Mr. REED. No. Now we will go to the next step. Does the Senator claim that this speculation that we are going to reach—the 50 per cent that is left of it—is to be found among the wholesalers? If so, to what extent, and what evidence have we of it?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator was in the Chamber, but I have gone over that somewhat—not nearly to the extent, I think, that I might have gone—and read from a report of the Trade Commission, from a committee investigating Washington, and from other evidences, showing, for instance, in regard to the entire canned-goods crop of the country, what profits were made by the jobbers who brought the canned goods from the canners.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I saw those figures, given out by the Federal Trade Commission; and I say to the Senator and to the country that I was astounded that any board claiming to take official cognizance of trade conditions would present to the country the kind of figures that were presented by the Federal Trade Commission, at least in some respects. Let me call attention to them.

It asserted that robbery was being practiced, and proved it by showing that the retail price for a can of tomatoes was about twice as much at the present time as the wholesale price of that can of tomatoes was a year ago. Now, to begin with, everybody who has any sense at all knows that the groceryman buys his cans of tomatoes by the case or by several cases, and maybe some of them buy them by carload lots; I do not know; but they get them in large quantities in bulk. When they sell them, they generally sell them a single can at a time; and when they sell that single can they generally have to tote it from their store to a residence that may be miles away. Everybody knows that if you went to that same groceryman and proposed to back up your wagon and take a case of tomatoes, take them in the same form that he buys them, he would sell them to you for much less than the retail price on the basis of a single can. So the figures that this illustrious and sometime famous board down here give us by comparing retail prices with wholesale prices are not a fair basis of comparison.

Now, I call attention to another thing. We are getting a little away from the question I wanted to discuss, but while I am on it let me discuss this for a minute. A comparison was made of this year's retail prices with last year's wholesale prices. Mr. President, the currency of the world has almost doubled in that length of time. The price of every conceivable thing has mounted. In addition to that, there was a short crop last year and an abnormal demand this year. So that these figures that these gentlemen gave did not demonstrate speculation; they did not demonstrate extortion; they did not demonstrate anything, to my knowledge, except that the Federal Trade Commission had not gone to the bottom of the question.

I will tell the Senator where I think there is some reason for complaint with the wholesale trade that has been demonstrated, and where I think some relief can be had. It is in evidence here by a grand-jury report that certain members of the wholesale trade, having sold goods to the retailers, and having observed a rise in prices, and desirous to raise prices themselves, have sent to their retailers a demand, or what amounts to a demand, that they shall raise their prices. Now, Mr. President, that is a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me interrupt the Senator right there to say that I have already put in those figures, and I have already said what the Senator has said now—that, in my judgment, the very grand-jury report shows on its face, if it is true, that there was a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. REED. Exactly; but will the Senator let me conclude my statement, so that it will not be partial? There was put in the RECORD the other day a telegram showing that the Colgate Soap Co., which had been regularly selling its soap to a large wholesale house in Tennessee, had demanded that that house should raise its price upon soap which it had already bought, and had said to it, "If you do not raise your price, we must consider you an undesirable customer," and that upon this Tennessee wholesale house refusing to comply, the Colgate Co. refused any longer to sell it soap.

There are other things that I do not care to go into that point very clearly, in my mind, to the fact that there are certain of these institutions engaged in those practices. Every one of those practices that I have heard mentioned can be reached and ought to be reached by the Department of Justice of the United States and by the departments of justice of the several States and counties of this Nation.

I do not think we gain a single thing by proposing to abandon criminal processes against rogues of that sort and to substitute for the criminal laws of this country the mandate or dictate of some man or some board.

I should like to ask the Senator, however, if he believes that there is in the wholesale business, growing out of the practices that we have referred to, such an extensive system as has materially affected the prices of the country?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I do. I want to refer to the report of the grand jury, which I have not at hand at this moment, as it has been taken by the reporter. I read from that report the fact, as I remember now, speaking from memory, that the wholesalers and the jobbers had bought all of the canned goods of the country from the canners and were engaged now in selling them to the retailers at a profit somewhat in excess of 100 per cent. It seems to me that that is an exorbitant profit——

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Particularly when they buy the goods before the farmer has raised the products that are canned, and they sell them again before that time. I am not complaining of that. That is a method of doing business, but it only demonstrates that they do not even have money invested in it for any great length of time until they get it back from the retailer, and they are charging a profit of from 100 to 150 per cent in that one transaction.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I understand it to be true that the regular course of business is for the canners to buy goods in advance of the season—I mean for the wholesalers to buy goods in advance of the season——

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the canners do it, too.

Mr. REED. To contract for it in advance, and that what was done this year is what has been done regularly every year. I want to ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], who is in that business, what the facts are in regard to that.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FERNALD. I ought to know something about this matter. It has been my business for 30 years, and I propose to be absolutely fair in what I have to say. There are so many inaccurate things said, not from any desire to be unfair but from a lack of knowledge, that it seems to me this is a proper time to set this matter right.

Referring to the article that has been read by the Senator from Nebraska, while some parts of it are true, there are statements in it that are absolutely untrue. The regular course of the purchase of canned goods is this:

Every canner in the country, I suppose, so far as I know—and I think I know most of them—sells his goods in advance. The vegetables that are to be packed this year were sold last winter, in January or February.

We have to furnish the farmers with their seed and fertilizer and make preparations for the coming pack; and in doing that, in naming our price, we have to determine what it is going to cost to pack the goods. The goods are sold from 6 to 10 months before they are ever packed. In order to do that we must determine the price of cans, the price of solder, the price of labor, and the price of everything that goes to make up the canned pack.

There has been an advance in canned goods during the past year. The article from which the Senator has read would show that there has been a very great advance, but this was for just one year. I have known years when jobbers lost money on canned goods. It is not an absolutely sure proposition that you are going to make money because you are dealing in canned goods. Some years you make and some years you lose. If the dispositions of all men were the same there would not be much activity in business; but when a packer goes out to sell his goods in the winter months, he goes to one buyer, who is an optimistic fellow, and he looks to the future and sees a profit in buying at the price that is made by the packer. Another buyer is of a pessimistic nature. He buys less than he naturally would buy. He looks forward to the future and sees a prospect that the war is to be closed and that people are to return to their natural vocations of labor, and he buys less.

This is what was done last year in the jobbing trade. Now, the man who bought last year rather more than his usual wants has had goods to sell now. The jobber who bought less than he usually needed has been short, and he has been obliged to go to the man who had the goods to sell. The man who had the goods, knowing that for two years there has been only 65 per cent of a normal delivery, has been able, in order to supply his retail trade and have goods to carry his retail merchants through, to make an advanced price.

The price named for corn in the article from which the Senator read was 65 cents. There is an error there. That price was 95 cents. Another error is that I do not know of a single packer in this country who does not sell to anybody. There is no combination among the packers of the country. There is no reason why we should not sell to the retailer; and, so far as I know, every packer does sell to the retailer. He sells to the individual; he sells to anybody that will pay the price.

The price depends altogether upon the conditions and the elements.

Some years we may have a very large pack; we pack 140 or 150 per cent of the normal. Perhaps the next year it is only 65 per cent of the normal. The price depends entirely upon the crops. Within five years I have seen the finest apple crop that was ever grown in this country rot upon the trees because there were more apples than the people could consume. Within five years, and I think within three years, we have seen cotton at the lowest price that it was ever known to bring, because there was a large crop. So these prices depend entirely upon the crop conditions.

If a minimum price should be established on any one thing, that price, in order to be a fair one, would have to be changed every day of the year. Last year, for instance, we had a very small potato crop. The demand for potatoes was unusually large because of the conditions in the foreign countries that have been in the habit of raising enormous crops of potatoes. Our country raises but a very small part of the potatoes that are raised in the world. Russia, under normal conditions, raises three times as many potatoes as we raise in this country. Germany, under normal conditions, raises four and a half times as many potatoes as we raise in this country. France raises about the same, rather more than we raise in this country. In addition to these crops being cut off in foreign countries, there was an unsual demand in this country because of the fact that every farmer was asked to plant a larger acreage. New York State alone planted 77,000 acres extra of potatoes. My State of Maine planted 46,000 acres extra of potatoes. It takes six bushels of seed potatoes to plant an acre, so the conditions that arise from a large acreage made a tremendous demand for potatoes, and the price went as high as $12 or $14 a barrel. Now conditions have entirely changed, and there is going to be a large crop of potatoes, and they are down to $2 and $4 a barrel. So that any price that might have been named three months ago which would have been considered a fair price then would be at this time an exceedingly unfair price to the consumer.

In my judgment these matters adjust themselves. I do not think it is the wise thing to undertake to set a price on any article. Certainly if a price is to be established on one thing, everything that the farmer buys ought to have a price established on it. One commodity that has not been mentioned in the discussion up to this time—and I must say that it has been very thoroughly argued on both sides—is the question of labor. About 60 per cent of the cost of producing a crop anywhere in this country, certainly in my part of the country, is the cost of labor. If a price is to be established on the farmer's crop, certainly that must be taken into consideration.

It seems to me, however, that we are working from the wrong angle here. Everybody seems to admit that the farmer has not tried to advance prices, and that he has not received any too much for his crop, either potatoes or wheat or any of the crops that he raises; but it is this "wicked middle man" that is spoken of. I do not know who he is. I know that the canned-goods broker gets 2 per cent for doing the business; I know that the jobber does not make any too much, and everybody knows that only about 2 per cent of the retailers of this country succeed.

This is a very serious question with me. It is a matter which I believe deserves all the consideration it is having at this time in order to determine just what is the right thing to do in this matter. If there were any way in which we could stop the hoarding or stop the gambling or stop any unfair practices or methods of trade in regard to cereals or food products. I would go to any length to get at that fellow; but it has seemed to me, not being an attorney, that by enforcing the Sherman antitrust law or the Clayton antitrust law or the Federal Trade Commission law, or from some source or from some amendment that might be added, we might stop that unfair competition, if there is any.

Certainly the crops must be financed. As the Senator from North Dakota has said, the farmers can not carry these crops. They have been patriotic in furnishing the largest acreage of everything in this country, as they were asked to do. Every farmer has gone to the limit, and has raised every acre that it is possible to raise—in fact, even more than he finds himself able to harvest without some help from the State or Government.

In my State the farmers are writing me letters to the effect that something must be done to give them labor. In Aroostook County, Me., that is raising the largest crop and the largest acreage of potatoes that was ever known in the county's history, the farmers write me every day that something must be done to furnish labor to harvest that crop. Those are things that must be considered if we are going to consider the price of foodstuffs in this bill.

I do not feel that this article which the Senator from Nebraska has read is entirely fair to the jobbers. I do not feel that it is entirely fair to the canners. There is no combination among the canners of the country, the meat packers, the vegetable packers, the fruit packers, because you gentlemen who come from every State in this Union where they have canning factories know that no such combination exists, and know that there is not a packer, so far as I know, but that is willing to sell his goods to anybody. But it has been found to be an economical way of handling goods to sell to the jobber, and, as the Senator from Missouri says, they are not sold by the can or the case or the hundred cases, but they are sold by the carload. The packer distributes his goods by the carload, in large quantities, and it is not possible for the packer to carry those goods.

Because of the conditions surrounding the plants in my State all of the goods have to be shipped out before the cold weather sets in. Before it begins to freeze in our warehouses the goods must be distributed, and they have to be sold in order to be distributed before the freezing weather sets in. All of these things are considered by business men, by the canners themselves, and they themselves work out the most economical plan for handling those products.

While I am not at all interested in the wheat crop, it seems to me to be entirely unfair to take a single article and determine what the market price of that article shall be. It is not fair to the farmers of the West who are raising wheat, in my judgment. It would not be fair to take one article in my State, such as potatoes, and determine the price at which potatoes should be sold, because the conditions surrounding the growing of the crop determine what the price should be, and those conditions are changing every day.

Senators, while we have discussed this measure at considerable length and for many days, I feel confident that there has been no filibustering or attempting to filibuster, because every day I am enlightened; but when such articles as this appear, it seems only fair that any Senator who knows about these things should tell the facts exactly as they are. If there is any combination, no man in this Senate will go further than I will after the unfair operator; but it does seem to me that having had the Sherman antitrust law on the statute books for 27 years these offenses can be reached under that law. If it is not strong eough, let us make it stronger. Two years ago it was suggested by Senators that it was nobody's business in particular to attend to the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law.

I beg the pardon of the Senator from Nebraska for taking up so much of his time. I rose just to make clear the matter to which he referred, and I felt that he would be glad to get such information as I might have on the subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Maine, and I am satisfied that the Senate appreciates his contribution to this discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] finds the same trouble among his constituents that we do in the Mississippi Valley country—shortness of labor. Nobody has yet discovered, it seems, a remedy for that condition; but the Legislature of West Virginia has made a very sensible move in a statute passed May 19, 1917, and in effect June 19, which requires every able-bodied male citizen of West Virginia to have some occupation, profession, trade, or calling. If he has not, they bring him before a magistrate and adjudge him guilty of vagrancy, and put him to work.

With the Senator's permission I should like to offer for printing in the RECORD a circular letter addressed "To all manufacturers, coal operators, and mill owners," signed by John J. Cornwell, governor of West Virginia, attached to it being a copy of this extraordinary statute, which appears to be a very sensible one in many ways. I should like to have it inserted as a part of the current information in regard to the inquiry made by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection, of course, to its insertion, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Charleston.

To all manufacturers, coal operators, and mill owners:

On June 19 the act passed by the last legislature requiring all able-bodied male residents between the ages of 16 and 60 years to work at least 36 hours each week becomes effective. To aid in the enforcement of this law you should report to the mayor of your city or town, or to the nearest justice of the peace, the names of any persons on your rolls who do not work the 36 hours any week during the war and who have no good excuses for not working.

I suggest, also, you keep an honor roll of employees who work full time, post a copy of the honor roll in a public place, and send a copy to this office.

We have a roll of the chronic idlers in the State and would like to obtain a list of men who work full time at their various callings. The men who put all their time and energy into production of any kind of commodities during this war are doing real patriotic service and records should be kept of their service.

Respectfully,

JNO. J. CORNWELL, Governor.

[Advance copy of an act of the Legislature of West Virginia, second extraordinary session, 1917, being Senate bill No. 7, passed May 19, 1917. In effect 30 days from passage.]

An act to prevent idleness and vagrancy in West Virginia during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of West Virginia:

SECTION 1. It is hereby declared to be the duty of every able-bodied male resident of this State between the ages of 16 and 60 years to habitually and regularly engage in some lawful, useful, and recognized business, profession, occupation, or employment whereby he may produce or earn sufficient to support himself and those legally dependent upon him.

SEC. 2. From the time this act becomes effective, and thenceforward until six months after the termination of the present war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, any able-bodied male resident of this State between the ages of 16 and 60, except bona fide students during school term, who shall fail or refuse to regularly and steadily engage for at least 36 hours per week in some lawful and recognized business, profession, occupation, or employment, whereby he may contribute to the support of himself and those legally dependent upon him, shall be held to be a vagrant within the meaning and effect of this act and shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $100 for each offense, and as a part of such sentence and punishment such offender shall be by the trial court ordered to work not exceeding 60 days upon the public roads or streets or upon some other public work being done by and in the county in which such person shall be convicted, or by any municipality therein. One-half of the fair value of any such labor so performed under such sentence shall be paid by the county or municipality receiving the same toward the support of any persons legally dependent upon such vagrant, but if there shall be no such legal dependents, then no payment shall be made on account of any labor performed under such judgment. Any labor so required by a judgment of conviction hereunder shall be rendered in all respects as is now provided by law in the case of other prisoners in jail.

Prosecutions for vagrancy hereunder shall be instituted and conducted as other criminal prosecutions, and in no case shall the possession by the accused of money, property, or income sufficient to support himself and those legally dependent upon him be a defense to any prosecution under this act. In no case shall the claim by the accused of inability to obtain work or employment be a defense to a prosecution hereunder unless it shall be proved that the accused promptly notified the proper representative of the State council of defense of his inability to obtain employment and requested that work or employment be found for him and that such employment was not furnished him.

SEC. 3. All justices of the peace, mayors, and police judges within the State are hereby given jurisdiction to try and punish all offenders under this act, or such prosecution may be by indictment. Each week or portion thereof that such resident shall continue a vagrant hereunder shall constitute a separate offense, and no appeal shall be allowed from any judgment of conviction for a vagrancy unless the accussed shall give bond, with penalty and security to be fixed and approved by the court granting the appeal, conditioned not to violate this act during the pendency of such appeal. Any judgment for the performance of labor hereunder may be suspended by the court pronouncing the same upon the execution by the person convicted of a bond, with the penalty and security approved by the court, conditioned to comply with the provisions of this act for one year from the date of such bond. A violation of the condition of such last-mentioned bond shall entitle the State to recover the amount of the penalty thereof, and in addition thereto the convicted person shall be rearrested and required to serve the sentence formerly pronounced against him.

SEC. 4. For the purposes of this act any male person found in this State shall be deemed a resident, and in any prosecution hereunder proof that the accused habitually loiters in idleness in streets, roads, depots, pool rooms, hotels, stores, or other public place, or that he is habitually intoxicated, or is addicted to the use of narcotic drugs, or is a professional gambler, or, being able bodied is supported in whole or in part by the labor of any woman or child, shall be prima facie evidence of vagrancy.

SEC. 5. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act, or any part hereof, are hereby repealed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was very much interested in what the Senator from Maine said. However, he is laboring under a misapprehension as to my attitude on at least a good many things he mentions. I do not think anybody has thought for a moment that a price on canned goods should be fixed arbitrarily by some governmental authority. I do not think anybody has contemplated that. I have not heard it suggested. I do not believe myself it would be a practical thing to do.

I have been reading from the report of the grand jury in Chicago. I suppose their report was made up from conclusions drawn from the testimony of witnesses who appeared before them. I have no knowledge as to any combination among the packers. In fact the statements in this report of the grand jury that might be construed to mean that there was a combination among canners had not occurred to me until the Senator from Maine spoke. That was not the object in reading it. What I was showing was that the jobbers who bought the canned goods of the canners had sold them at a profit to the retailers, in many cases, of considerably over 10 per cent. The grand jury report says they bought up practically the entire product of the articles mentioned in the report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. It appears from the statement of the Senator from Maine that that is the ordinary custom.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; buying up any product; that is the ordinary custom. The report of the grand jury says that.

Mr. REED. Buying it a year in advance.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there is nothing wrong about that that I know of.

Mr. REED. What I am trying to get at is something practical. The Senator, I take it, would hardly claim that a wholesaler's profits could be limited by law, or that if a wholesaler happened to have on hand something that the country was short of and the price went up he could not reap the benefit of the price.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If the Senator will kindly let me finish the question; of course, I am proceeding by his courtesy alone.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. REED. Therefore are we not left to this, that about the only place the law can lay its hand on the wholesaler is if he engages in some conspiracy in restraint of trade or if he seeks to create a monopoly in trade, and if he does not do either the one or the other we can not reach him at all unless we reach him under the clause—the hoarding clause of the bill which we recently passed and which the House has not yet seen fit to consider? Is not that about all that we can do?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not agree with the Senator. That would not be hoarding. The practice that is spoken of here, the profits mentioned here by the grand jury, would not be hoarding.

Mr. REED. No; the Senator did not understand my question. I asked is there anything else that we can do except to get him for conspiracy in restraint of trade or for endeavoring to establish a monopoly or else under the hoarding provision that we recently passed which the House has not concurred in. I am referring to all three of them.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator refers to the definition for hoarding in section 6 of this bill?

Mr. REED. No; I refer to what we call the Poindexter-Walsh amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; probably we could reach him under that. My own idea has been that the conditions described by the grand jury existing among the jobbers in canned goods showed on its face that there was a violation of the Sherman antitrust law, that it was a conspiracy in restraint of trade. That seemed plain to me.

Mr. REED. That is my opinion, if the report is accurate.

Mr. NORRIS. If the report is accurate and is taken for its face value. That is true, Mr. President, of a great many of the things that we are attempting to remedy by this proposed legislation. That is true of the coal situation, which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] laid before us the other day. I am one of those who, while favoring the bill, still have always believed that if the Department of Justice would follow up its duty a great many of these conditions, nearly all of them, would be found to be violative of the Sherman antitrust law and subject to prosecution.

Mr. REED. Now——

Mr. NORRIS. Just let me go a little further.

Mr. President, I have seriously debated in my own mind whenever these things were presented whether it was wise to do what is wanted to be done by the administration in passing this bill or to stand up and say that is a violation of existing law, and if you do your duty you will prosecute these men as violators of the law. I have always rather resolved the doubt in favor of the Department of Justice or the administration and thought they were going to enforce the law. I believe here is a condition existing that absolutely demands a remedy, and I have better resolved the doubt in favor of giving them the kind of law they want.

Mr. REED. The Department of Justice is not asking for this law. I say to the Senator, I think the antitrust laws could be strengthened. When we had the Clayton bill before us it came to us from the House of Representatives a very strong and forceful measure. It was emasculated in the Senate and against its emasculation I contended as bitterly as I have been contending on this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. And I was with the Senator in his contention.

Mr. REED. The Senator will remember that we were told at that time it was desired that the bill should have these stringent provisions taken out of it. That argument was urged. I do not know that it does any good to go back and refer to this matter except as a lesson, and the lesson ought to be for Congress to exercise its own judgment and do what it thinks is right.

I started on a theme with the Senator, and I have been getting along so well I want to take a further step. We have dealt now with the wholesaler and we have dealt with the retailer. Now, what other element is there that we can reach that is controlling the prices of food between the producer and the consumer? Is there anything left but the boards of trade? Does the Senator think so?

Mr. NORRIS. I presume the fellow who hoards food or the corporation that hoards food would probably not be strictly included in the class the Senator has alluded to.

Mr. REED. What would the Senator mean by that; the cold-storage house?

Mr. NORRIS. Possibly. I would mean those that are defined by section 6 of this act.

Mr. REED. Now, let us come to the cold-storage plant. I think we can get some light on that if we will deal with it fairly. Of course, we all know that a cold-storage plant properly operated has a tendency to get better prices for the producer during the season of great plenty when there is a surplus.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it has a tendency to equalize prices to the consumer.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. And it is a good thing for both the producer and the consumer if properly managed.

Mr. REED. And gets lower prices for the consumer in the time of scarcity.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. So if it is properly operated it is a great blessing. It is that which enables us perhaps to have eggs in January in plenty and to have apples and other edibles in January and February and March, when we could not get them otherwise. Now, does the Senator know of any evidence of any holding in the cold-storage plants of this country sufficiently great to account for any very large increase in prices? I have been waiting for that evidence.

Mr. NORRIS. I saw the statement—it seems to me it was in the paper this morning; if it was not the morning paper, I read it in something to-day or within a few days—that at the present time there is a larger quantity of meat, of poultry, of eggs, and several other kinds of products in cold storage than there has ever been in cold storage before in the history of the United States, and at a time when the prices are higher than ever before. That of itself might not necessarily mean that there was anything wrong, but it would be evidence of it.

Mr. REED. Let us assume there was more meat in cold-storage houses, or more eggs or more chickens, is it not true that there is not more than enough there to make up in ordinary times for the deficiency of our shipments to Europe occasioned by the interference through the German blockade? I am trying to differentiate between——

Mr. NORRIS. That would not necessarily make any difference with the amount. If there is more of these food products in cold storage now than there ever has been at any one time in the history of the United States it would be some evidence, at least, that there was something tending toward holding back products that ought to be released.

Mr. REED. If the motive was not to hold them to run up American prices; but if they were held because they had been purchased, perhaps at high prices, and were being held for the European market and not for the purpose of booming prices in this country, or forestalling the market, the Senator, of course, would admit that to be quite a different question than if the motive had been otherwise.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not say that because there was a larger quantity now than ever before there is necessarily anything wrong in it. I say that would be perhaps evidence, and good evidence, of a hoarding or of a combination.

Mr. REED. Now, without any evidence as to combinations, the fact that there is more on hand, it seems to me, does not argue very much. Besides, I call the Senator's attention to the loose figures which are constantly given out. I called attention to the fact that the statement which was in the papers and went all over the country that there were 100,000,000 eggs in cold storage sounded big, and yet it would not have made one breakfast for the American people.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but let me say to the Senator the statement that I said I thought I read in the paper to-day was a report from the Agricultural Department, these storage houses reporting to the Agricultural Department in answer to their inquiries. The statement was put out by the Agricultural Department. There has been such a statement within the last few days from the Agricultural Department.

Mr. REED. Whatever that fact may be, if there is an actual conspiracy, the Sherman law would meet it, would it not?

Mr. NORRIS. I should think so.

Mr. REED. If it was just a hoarding, then the Walsh-Poindexter amendment would probably reach it.

Mr. NORRIS. That has not become a law as yet.

Mr. REED. No; but I am speaking about what we can do.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would if it were a law.

Mr. REED. Now, let us proceed. We have reached the point that these conditions can be remedied by existing laws or by the bill we have just spoken of. Now, where else do we come to, except boards of trade? I want to get the Senator's view in regard to boards of trade, because there has been very much said about them, and it is almost all a man's life is worth to say a word with reference to them unless it be a demand that all the members be executed without trial. I want to call the Senator's attention to a letter which I have here from a grain firm in Amarillo, Tex. I will just read a sentence to him:

> Wheat harvest is on in Texas and Oklahoma. Wheat is being daily offered for sale, but there are no buyers. The mills, elevators, the exporters, are all afraid to acquire any wheat, fearing drastic action by the food administrator as soon as the present bill is passed. If a given price is fixed by this department as a fair value for wheat, it will mean that the farming interests of the country will be forced to carry this wheat, as the Government is not prepared to handle it, and will not be for many months, if it should desire to do so. The farmer will not be able to meet his obligations under these conditions, and the grain business of the country, unless it is absolutely controlled and operated by the Government, will be paralyzed.
> It is almost the universal opinion of grain men throughout this section that this bill will prove ineffective and disastrous. Rabid speculation can be stopped without resorting to means embodied in the present bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will let me proceed now.

Mr. REED. I was proceeding with the Senator's consent. I wish to ask him now if he does not recognize the fact, after all this debate, that if we close the grain exchanges of the country and do not provide some other market for the farmer or some means of carrying his grain we will deprive him of his market?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; probably we will.

Mr. President, the letter that the Senator has read shows that there is a fear, and I am told it is more or less general. I think there are some reasons for the fear. I believe naturally from the very fact that we are legislating, that this bill, as important and as stringent as it is, is pending in the Senate, without anybody being able to tell just what may be the outcome, it will necessarily follow that in the country there should be some uncertainty in regard to the markets of the products that are affected by the bill. I do not believe, however, that that is a sufficient reason why the bill should be defeated. In my judgment that is one of the natural effects that would exist now. It will be cured, I think, when the bill is enacted into law or when it is defeated; in other words, when the question is settled. It is in an unsettled condition now and necessarily must affect more or less, regardless of the merits of this measure, the markets of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just wait a moment. The Senator from Maine and the Senator from Missouri have taken an hour and a half in questions now. I should like to have just a few minutes and then I will yield to the Senator.

I started to say when I was interrupted by the Senator from Missouri that the Senator from Maine, in my judgment, has a misconception as to what those who favored this legislation are trying to accomplish, a misconception of what would be done if the bill became a law. He evidently was laboring under the impression that if the bill became a law there would be a price fixed on canned goods and the per cent of profit that the wholesaler would be allowed to make, that there would be a price fixed on everything; and yet, in his argument in favor of protecting the farmer, he said if you fix the price of the farmer's wheat then you must fix the price of the things the farmer has to buy. If it were a definite price, I believe that would be true; but the law does not anticipate that anything except a minimum price shall be fixed for the farmer, and it is the intention of those who put it in the law that that shall be for the farmer's protection and the farmer's benefit. If that would be to his injury, then those who favor this legislation are mistaken. While there are things in the bill that to a certain extent indirectly will permit the President, through the powers that are given him to affect the maximum price, there is no direct fixing of a maximum price for anybody for anything. Of course, to protect the consumer, on the other hand, it is necessary, if we are going into it at all, that the President, or whatever board should have this authority, should have the power by which the consumer could be protected.

We have the two extremes. Both of them must be protected. It is the object of this legislation to protect them both, and therefore the stringent regulations through which the power is given to the President to control even the profits of some of the men, corporations, and institutions that are dealing in food products from the time they leave the producer until they reach the consumer.

Now, those are drastic propositions. As I said in the beginning, they almost startle one; but we are living and legislating in a condition the like of which has never before existed. I believe the evidence is sufficient and is ample and is practical, within the common knowledge of all, that the high cost of living is going to make it absolutely necessary that some steps be taken by the Government to protect the people against the high prices. Now, that is true, regardless of the cause of the high cost. It may be like the coal dealer said, "We are getting too much money, but we can not help it." They are getting it and somebody has to pay it. The consumer in the end foots the bill. We may be mistaken as to the necessity of passing this legislation. I may be wrong. I confess I have a lot of doubt about almost all of it; but I know of no other way than to do the best under all the circumstances. After listening to all the evidence that has been offered, I am going to do the best for all the people as I see it.

The Senator from Missouri said he did not understand that the Attorney General wanted this bill, or was asking for it, rather. I think those were his words. Of course everybody knows it is an administration measure. The President wants it; the Attorney General wants it; every member of the Cabinet wants it. I say that without finding fault with anybody. It is not suggested in a critical sense, but it is true nevertheless, and everybody knows it.

The doubt that I have about a great many of these things which we are trying to cover here being already covered by existing law I think enters the mind of practically all legislators who have given the subject careful consideration. The fact that the Senator from Maine, himself a canner and understanding the business thoroughly, has claimed that there is no combination among canners, when there was not any charge made that there was such a combination except as it incidentally appeared in the report, does not, in my judgment, do away with that part of the grand jury's report in which they set out the letter that the jobbers have written to the retailers asking them to increase the price, telling them that now is the hardest time, when they themselves are making a profit of over 100 per cent on the goods as it passes through their hands. You may call it legal or illegal, but if that condition exists it is one that must be remedied. The great consuming public can not always tolerate it or put up with it. With the increase in the cost of living and the increased taxation there must follow suffering and misery among a large portion of our people, and it will reach that class who heretofore have been living at least in comfort if not in partial luxury; and with that condition, even if we escaped revolution, we would not be in a proper condition to fight successfully a great war.

I yield now to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator may go on and close.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator let me put in the figures on wheat and flour? We were dealing with that a little while ago. It is just the market quotations.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. REED. A while ago the Senator was dealing with the relative prices of wheat and flour.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I was not dealing with it; it was the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. If the Senator wants to put in the figures, I have no objection. I would be glad to have him do it.

Mr. REED. I just thought it would be in the interest of accuracy.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I would be glad to have the Senator do it.

Mr. REED. The Journal of Commerce of to-day shows practically no wheat moving in New York. So I can not give the New York quotations for wheat; but in Chicago July wheat is quoted at $2.05, in Kansas City at $2.04, in St. Louis at $2.03. The Chicago market is always a few cents below the New York market. Unfortunately I do not have the Chicago price for flour, but I do have the New York price for flour, and it is as follows: Patent, $11.75 to $12; straight, $11.40 to $11.65; clear, $10.50 to $10.75; low grade, $6.25 to $8.50.

It will be observed therefore that the price of flour in New York per barrel is probably not more than five times the price of a bushel of wheat, and accordingly there is, as I have concluded, a complete harmony between wheat prices and flour prices.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. REED. Yes; I just wished to put those figures in.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would be well to call the attention of the Senate to the letter that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] put in the RECORD on the 25th day of June. It appears to be a report of the grand jury. I do not care to repeat it. It is already in the RECORD under date of June 25, on page 3919, where it is shown that the report of the grand jury in Chicago was practically duplicated in the State of Iowa.

From information gathered—

This letter says—

I find that the sweet-corn pack for Iowa for 1917 will approximate 2,000,000 cases of two dozen cans each. During the month of January this pack was sold to jobbers at from $1.76 to $1.80 per case. In quoting prices for delivery of this pack the jobbers ask $2.90 to $3.20 per case—

That is about the same kind of increase the jobbers had at Chicago that the grand jury were investigating—

The sale price by the canners I have from records and the delivery price I obtained from the dealers who have asked for quotations. The pack for 1916 was sold at from $1.30 to $1.36, and for this corn, which is in the hands of the jobbers, quotations from $3.20 to $3.50 are made. These figures I have from records of sales and purchases.

I do not believe there can be any doubt on that proposition, Mr. President, and that some of these profits are enormous. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] showed the other day from the quotations that the men who mine coal are charging 100, 200, 400, and, I think, in some cases, as high as 600 per cent in excess of what they charged a year ago for the same coal, and some of them, in their own letters, admitted that they were not justified in doing it. Coal enters into every home; it comes to every fireside. The poorer people suffer from this increased price, and most of the middle class, in my opinion, because they must all have fuel as well as food.

In conclusion, I wish to put in the RECORD a letter written by myself to Mr. Hoover, and his reply. I wrote this letter on behalf of some of the farmers' organizations or their representatives here, who were fearful as to what Mr. Hoover contemplated in case this bill became a law. I will not take the time to read it, but I think it is a fair answer, although Mr. Hoover is unable to answer definitely all the questions that I put to him.

Mr. STERLING. Will not the Senator read it?

Mr. NORRIS. My letter is quite long, and he answers the questions by number and does not repeat the questions, so it would not be intelligible to have it read. One must have it before him and read it. I might read the questions I asked him:

1. Is it your purpose to take over any of the big productive plants of the country, such as packing plants, large grain elevators, and flouring mills?

2. If you do, what protection will you give the small plants in the same line, which will be, in a measure, shut out from the Government market?

3. What changes do you have in mind making in our present live stock, grain, and other markets?
4. Is there any class of business men that you have in mind that it will be necessary to eliminate?
5. Will you eliminate, for instance, the commission merchant who receives consignments to these markets, such as hay, live stock, grain, or produce?
6. If the commission merchants are to continue to do business, how will your department handle them?
7. How do you propose to handle the small industries of the country in your system of distribution, such industries as small packing plants, small flouring mills, etc.?

Mr. President, I ask to insert the letter and Mr. Hoover's answer in the RECORD, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 22, 1917.

Hon. HERBERT C. HOOVER,
New Interior Department Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HOOVER: I have been requested by the representative of the National Farmers' Cooperative Association to ask you several questions. I intended to have asked these questions this morning, if the hearing that was contemplated had been had, but since that hearing has been abandoned and no other hearing arranged for, I thought best to submit the questions to you by letter. These questions are asked in no spirit of antagonism or ill will. I understand from the representative of the National Farmers' Cooperative Association that the association is friendly to the enactment of the so-called "food-control bill." However, these farmers are somewhat anxious to know just what will be the condition at the close of the war of the farmer elevator companies. Not many years ago the farmers were shut out of the central markets, so that they were compelled to sell to the local grain dealers. They were not able to ship as grain dealers were to the regular markets of the country and have their grain sold by commission firms as the grain from the elevators was sold. Then organizations of farmers were formed but it was some time before these organizations were even recognized. They had some difficulty in getting commission merchants to handle their business. The work of organization was continued, however, and now all the markets of the country are open to them, very much the same as they are to the grain dealers. These farmers naturally have some anxiety as to the future of their organizations. They do not want to stand in the way of any regulations that present conditions seem to warrant. They are, however, anxious that when the present emergency has passed and peace again has come, that they will not find themselves out of business, with a long struggle ahead of them to again gain recognition. They have some fear that if the big plants are taken over and operated under Government supervision that such operation might work an injury to the smaller plants controlled and operated by the farmers themselves. They feel that the farmer elevator companies are now a most effective competition to the larger plants, and they are anxious that no step be taken, so that at the close of the war the business would be entirely controlled by the larger plants, those taken over by the Government during the war. The questions which they desire me to ask you are as follows:

1. Is it your purpose to take over any of the big productive plants of the country, such as packing plants, large grain elevators, and flouring mills?
2. If you do, what protection will you give the small plants in the same line, which will be in a measure shut out from the Government market?
3. What changes do you have in mind making in our present live stock, grain, and other markets?
4. Is there any class of business men that you have in mind that it will be necessary to eliminate?
5. Will you eliminate, for instance, the commission merchant who receives consignments to these markets, such as hay, live stock, grain, or produce?
6. If the commission merchants are to continue to do business, how will your department handle them?
7. How do you propose to handle the small industries of the country in your system of distribution, such industries as small packing plants, small flouring mills, etc.?

Your early attention and reply will be greatly appreciated by

Yours, truly,

G. W. NORRIS.

WASHINGTON, June 29, 1917.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR NORRIS: In reply to your letter of the 22d. Nothing whatever has been determined in any direction with regard to the matters which you mention. We have been giving a great deal of thought to the whole question, and have had consultations with numerous bodies and persons interested in one trade and another, with a desire that all plans formulated should, so far as humanly possible, receive the support of the people interested and should be adapted to their needs so long as they do not trespass upon paramount public interest.

As to the questions which you ask, I should say as to question No. 1, for instance, that it is not our present purpose to do anything of the sort, but a national emergency might arise within the next five years when it would be necessary. Question No. 2, therefore, falls out. Question No. 3 I simply can not anticipate. The matter is under study and differs with each different commodity. Question No. 4 and question No. 5 can be answered in the negative, provided they are prepared to accept regulation in the interest of the country as a whole. Question No. 6 depends entirely on the licensing clause in the bill as to what can be done for the protection of the consignee. This clause has been under alteration so many times that it seems impossible to define now what kind of regulations could be imposed. Question No. 7 and the whole of the questions generally seem to be based on the theory that we propose to take over industry and operate it for the Government. This is not either our view or my understanding of the legislation proposed, which is based entirely on a sense of regulation so as to excise as much as possible wasteful practices, exorbitant profits, and vicious speculation.

I would like to suggest that if the National Farmers' Cooperative Association can arrange to send a delegate to Washington, it would be a great assistance to us to discuss the whole situation. We are very anxious to initiate nothing which will disturb the growth of such institutions.

Yours, very truly, HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. NEW addressed the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Illinois, who rose awhile ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator desire to speak on this point?

Mr. NEW. No; I want, if the Senator from Illinois will yield to me just a moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator if he wants to ask me a question.

Mr. NEW. Has the Senator from Nebraska concluded his remarks?

Mr. NORRIS. I have, except that the Senator from Illinois wanted to ask me a question. After I have replied to him I shall yield the floor.

Mr. NEW. What I desire to say concerns another subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. In connection with what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] said as to the market found by the Texas farmer for wheat, I desire to add, because it relates to the same subject, the condition of the wheat trade in Chicago on the 9th day of July, 1917.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection, Mr. President; but I shall be glad to have the Senator from Illinois put that in.

Mr. SHERMAN. The article to which I refer states:

SLOW TRADE IN WHEAT.

Wheat trade has become insignificant. Receipts are small enough to confirm the reports of exhaustion of old supplies. With premiums still firm for good wheat, there is little being offered; and primary arrivals for the week were less than half as large as a year ago. The export trade as well as the buying of new wheat by dealers is of small proportions, as all business in wheat is waiting developments at Washington. Until it is known definitely what the program of the food administration will be, there will be little doing in this cereal. Millers are buying wheat in a hand-to-mouth way, but the flour trade also is quiet and waiting developments.

Hog receipts in the West for the week were 365,700 against 427,300 a year ago. Receipts showed a big falling off from the previous week, largely on account of the holiday. Prices for hogs have been fairly strong, and a better demand for fresh and cured meats was reported, while the demand for lard was slow. The foreign demand is expected to be good, although quiet at the present time, while the domestic requirements will be liberal.

In connection with the same matter mentioned in the report of the Federal grand jury of Chicago, a copy of which I also have, signed by the foreman of the grand jury, Mr. Gorgenson, there is another matter that has been placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. It concerns the Colgate Co. I think it is very similar to the matter mentioned in the report of the grand jury in Chicago, but it is not exactly the same state of facts.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has reference to a telegram which was read at the request of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SHERMAN. I refer to the telegram and to other matters, including an advertisement and communications from a wholesale grocery firm at Memphis, Tenn. I should like to have these matters in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD connected with the grand jury report in Chicago. It shows a similarity of dealings that I think are unfair.

Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if this is not directly related to the bill that has been pending in Congress for one or two sessions, which is known as the price-fixing bill, or the resale-price bill, commonly known as the Stephens bill? In the case to which I have referred the Colgate Co. undertook to do exactly what this bill would permit if it were enacted into law. It would control not only the merchandise which is consigned to the agents and held for sale as their represenatives, but it as well undertakes to fix the price on absolute sales where the title passes to the purchaser and the property is paid for. Not only that, but in the Memphis, Tenn., case the wholesale grocers had bought from the Colgate Co. a quantity of soap of a certain brand—the Octagon brand, I believe it is called—and owned it and had paid for it, and because they would not raise the price to the wholesale grocers' trade on the stock they had bought and paid for to a figure which would be equal to that for future sales of a like soap from the Colgate Co. the manufacturers and these jobbers put them on the unfair list, wired them that they were undesirable customers, and refused to sell them any further supplies of this kind. What would the Senator think of a transaction of that sort?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know what the Senator means by asking me what I think of that kind of a transaction.

Mr. SHERMAN. Ought it to be legalized, as contemplated in the Stephens bill?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it ought not to be legalized.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will come up at some time.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not in favor of the Stephens bill, I will say to the Senator. I do not believe that that kind of practice ought to be permitted, much less legalized. There ought to be no doubt that it is illegal.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to say that the same practices are known to me in innumerable instances.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, it is stated in this grand jury report—although the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] says that he does not think that is true—

> The canners, wholesalers, and jobbers have devised some means for insuring complete cooperation among themselves which results in keeping the canner from dealing directly with the consumer or with the retailer.

I can see, I think, however, that the Senator from Maine, being in the canning business in Maine, might not have kowledge of the custom or practice, or the conspiracy, if you want to call it such, that is in existence in the vicinity of Chicago among canners there who do business on that market.

> Wholesalers and jobbers will not buy—

This report says—

> from canners, in most cases, otherwise than through brokers. If retailers attempt to resist the combination by purchasing directly from the canner, they find it difficult or impossible to do any further business with the wholesalers or jobbers as to other groceries.

That is somewhat similar to the case which the Senator from Illinois puts regarding the Colgate Co.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are the same general course of business.

Mr. NORRIS. The same general principle is involved in each. Of course such things are wrong, as I look at them, and they ought not to be permitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not only in the case referred to in Memphis, Tenn., but in many instances in the city of Chicago, manufacturers have sought to control the prices of goods in the hands of jobbers, who were in turn told to increase their prices to the retail dealers who could recoup themselves by increasing the prices to the consumer. This practice is universal, and, I think, Mr. President, in connection with the Senator's concluding remarks, that it is a question for the district attorneys of the various districts in which these practices occur, and, to use a phrase that I do not like very well, to coordinate their activities in a number of cases of this kind so that they may secure a general advance on offenders.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I judge from the argument of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that he favors a minimum price for the wheat product. I have been waiting a long time here for anyone who favors that minimum price to give me the practical application of his theory. I want to know what the standard of measurement should be in fixing the minimum price. I want to know, Mr. President, because I feel that many a mere theory will meet its Waterloo whenever it is brought up against the battery of reason; and I want to take this theory of the Senator, that seems to him to be plausible; and I should like to ask him, or any other Senator, how he would operate this method of fixing a standard of measurement?

I remember in 1912 my friends on the other side were promising the dear public that the farmer would get better prices for his wheat and for everything else that he produced, and that the consumer would pay less for the things to eat which the farmer produced. I could not very well, then, understand how that could be worked out satisfactorily to both sides; but now I find a class of Senators here who feel that they can work that out in an entirely satisfactory manner. It is a Chinese puzzle that I should like to have solved by those who are advocating it.

They want to keep down the price of bread to the ultimate consumer and they wish to raise the price of wheat to such a standard that the farmer can make money out of it, even with the higher cost of labor, while he is farming.

Now, what will be your rule? Will you fix a definite standard of, say $2 per bushel? Well, let us see how that will work out. I will go down into Nebraska and perhaps raise 20 bushels of wheat to the acre this year, and if the price is $2 per bushel I would get $2 a bushel for a 20-bushel-per-acre crop. That would be an excessive price to charge against the consumer. I think we would all admit that that would be a little heavy. The average yield of wheat, I think, throughout the United States, taking one year with another, is about 13 bushels. But now we will suppose you fix the price at $2 per bushel, and your farmer down in Nebraska, on the basis of last year, if he would raise the same crop in 1917 and would apply that rule to this year's crop, would receive $40 an acre.

The farmers in my State raise about 5 bushels of wheat per acre. Am I correct, I will ask my colleague, because he is a better farmer than I?

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. The farmers in my State raise about 5 bushels of wheat to the acre. Then, if you would give them $2 a bushel, they would realize but $10 an acre; and with $10 an acre, in view of the present price of labor in the United States and what the farmer must pay for everything he purchases, he could not make a living. Then you would have one class receiving almost double what perhaps would be right and another class not receiving half of what is right. I inquire how are you going to determine it? What rule are you going to apply that will be satisfactory alike to the producer, the miller, and the final consumer?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President, because I am trying to get information.

Mr. REED. I do not rise to give any information.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am sorry.

Mr. REED. I rise to get some information. The Senator's analysis, of course, is very disturbing to the price regulator. The Senator has been asking the question how are "you," meaning the Congress, going to fix a price?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; or a food commissioner or anyone else.

Mr. REED. I was going to ask the Senator this question: Of course, the price must be fixed in advance of the sowing of the crop. If Congress can not fix it, how is anybody else going to fix it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am trying to find out how anyone could fix it in a manner that would be entirely satisfactory to both the consumer and the producer.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Possibly the Senator might get a satisfactory answer to that sort of a question from Col. Mulberry Sellers.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; he was always very optimistic, as I remember.

Mr. President, I think the difficulty can be solved, and I am going to suggest a method now. Although I will not argue that the amendment which I intend to propose is a solution that is going to work with absolute justice and equality to everyone, it is a solution that will at least approach equity. We can not say what will be a fair price, a just price, for crops that are going to be raised in 1918, because we do not know whether we are going to raise in any great section half a crop, whether we are going to raise a quarter of a crop, or whether we are going to raise a bumper crop, and what would be reasonable would depend entirely upon the quantity produced by a given section. If a farmer ordinarily produces 13 bushels per acre, we could take that as a fair average and base our price upon that; but the yield fluctuates. For instance, in 1915 it ran from 20 to 40 bushels per acre in my State, and the very next year the yield dropped down to about 5 bushels per acre. It is upon the yield per acre that we must base any estimate of what it costs the farmer per acre; and who can prognosticate as to what the weather will be in any particular section of the country, or what the crop yield will be per acre?

Mr. President, I am going to suggest an amendment, not that I can offer it now, because we have not yet completed the consideration of the committee amendments, but I will make the suggestion to the Senate. It is conceded by everyone that the farmer is entitled to a reasonable profit upon his investment. If he raises only a half crop, it requires three-fourths as much labor as it does to raise a full crop, and he ought to have a greater price for that half crop per bushel or per acre than he would have if he raised a much larger crop—not in the same proportion, but at least he should have a greater price. Suppose that we simply provide a guaranty in this bill to encourage the farmers of this country to produce next year all the wheat they can produce by saying to them not that we will fix a price but will ascertain the amount they have invested in farm lands over a given area of the country. For instance, as to spring wheat the area would embrace the two Dakotas, eastern Montana, and Minnesota. There is produced in those three States practically all of the spring wheat. It is a singular fact that if we have a failure or a half failure or a quarter failure in any one part of this vast section the same influence is felt to a great extent over the whole section.

The crop was short throughout Minnesota, throughout the two Dakotas, and throughout Montana last year. The crop was exceedingly good in every one of those States during the year 1915, and if you take the figures for a period of several years—15 or 20 years—you will find that that rule prevails with very little variation. We know what the average value of land in my State is, and it is very easy to ascertain what is the usual reasonable price paid for farm labor. We can estimate very carefully, as soon as we know what the crop is, what it has cost to produce that crop in a large section, and exactly what that crop would have to sell for to pay the labor and to pay a reasonable return upon the investment. If the Government will say to me next year, "We will guarantee a full return upon your investment," I will see that every acre of land that I own in the State—and I have a considerable number of acres there—will go into wheat, and I will take my chances that the Government will deal fairly with me and that I would get what my wheat was worth. That is all I have a right to ask during this time of stress when the country itself may be battling for life. Such a guarantee would encourage the farmer; it would assure him a fair return. If he raises a good crop and the market does not bring him a fair return the Government will say, "I will stand ready to see that you get so much for your grain, and if the market prices do not reach that level I will make it good to you by purchasing it, and I will purchase enough of it so that I will hold the price up to that standard."

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I ought first to yield to the Senator from Florida, who first rose.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was just going to ask the Senator a question. The Senator said that the average value of land in his State was known. I was not quite clear in my mind as to that, and I would like to ask the Senator if he will give the figures.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think a fair average would be about $40 per acre.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is that for land before it has ever been cleared and cultivated or put in shape for cultivation?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; a fair average would be about $40 per acre. Now, I think that we can work out something along that line that will be fair. I am willing to vote $2 a bushel, if Congress thinks that wise, but I think the plan I have suggested would be fairer to the Government and fairer to all sections of the country. Then if an exceedingly large crop is raised, we will say in the Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, and Texas section, where they raise practically the same kind of grain under practically the same atmospheric conditions, we could arrive at what their crop down there was worth, and if they raised twice as much as we did in the Northwest they would not be entitled to twice as much per bushel. That is the only method, Mr. President, that I can imagine that would be fair to all sections and to all producers alike.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. With the permission of the Senator, I would like to direct his attention to a matter he has just discussed, which was that it was impossible for the Government to fix the price of grain. Doubtless the Senator remembers that Lloyd-George, and those associated with him in the government, after full investigation, fixed the price to be paid the farmers of England for wheat up to and including the year 1921, and that the maximum to be paid was, as I remember, $1.80 per bushel; that this maximum was for one year only, and then was reduced, so that the farmer for the last year is to receive but $1.40 per bushel.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. KING. Without expressing approval or disapproval of the action of Lloyd-George, or of the excellent argument of the Senator from North Dakota, I should like to inquire whether he thinks the action of Lloyd-George was wise or unwise, and whether it was practicable and politic in the light of the conditions in which Great Britain found herself? I would also like the opinion of the Senator as to whether or not it would be impossible for our Government to fix a price, taking into account, of course, the labor question, the increased prices to the farmer of the commodities purchased by him, and all the ramifications that are involved in farming activities?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, Great Britain is a little country, about two-thirds the size of Minnesota. The proportion of acreage that can be planted in wheat, for instance, would probably be not more than one-quarter of the acreage of the State of Minnesota, and a favorable yield would reflect alike all over that little island, so far as the crop is concerned. Great Britain raises very little wheat. She is a purchaser of wheat, and, therefore, it would be quite easy, if she has the power, to say what she will pay for wheat or to commandeer the wheat of Canada or commandeer the wheat of Australia, even though by doing so an imposition were worked upon the farmers who produce that wheat.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon a further interruption?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me just add this: This country, on the contrary, must be an exporter of grain. No two great sections of the country are subject to exactly the same conditions. There may be a complete failure or a two-thirds failure in one section of the country, and at the same time a bumper crop in other sections. So the Senator can see how a general law fixing definitely a standard price must necessarily work inequitably over so vast an area and under such conditions.

Mr. KING. What I was about to suggest, of course, would not change the position or argument of the Senator; but I ought to have stated that Great Britain, in addition to fixing the price to be paid for wheat, also fixed the price for barley, oats, rye, and potatoes, covering the same period to which I referred a moment ago.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. I can not say how it will work out in England, except that I understand that it works out very unsatisfactorily, and that the law of supply and demand probably would work to better advantage than the rules they have applied. There may be a difference of opinion upon that, and I confess that I have not such definite information as would allow me to form an accurate judgment.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me a further suggestion, the information I have also indicates that, instead of its having a bad effect and diminishing the acreage cultivated, the action of Lloyd-George has increased very largely the number of acres the farmers have cultivated. It seems to have stimulated production and encouraged agriculture. Whether it was because he fixed prices so high as to encourage production or other causes entered into consideration, I am unable to speak with certainty; but, at any rate, the statements made by Lloyd-George and by others, so far as I am advised, are to the effect that the action of the Government in establishing prices has stimulated production very greatly and increased the acreage cultivated in Great Britain.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is another reason why it would work very much more equitably in Great Britain than here. Under her conscription laws she will use her conscripted forces at home upon the farms, if necessary. I do not know that we have any such power here in the United States; and even if we should attempt to enforce such a power and use a class of laborers upon the farm who are not used to farm labor, I very much fear that we would not make a success of it. Take the average boy in the city of Washington who has spent most of his afternoons and evenings at a 10-cent movie show. He has not that muscle or strength which will enable him to stand and pitch bundles for 16 hours steadily upon a farm in North Dakota, and sleep on the barn floor during the night. I think we would find that he would be a failure. I think we would find that the average laborer, who has been receiving a dollar and a quarter an hour for doing three-fourths of a day's work laying brick here in the city, would faint the moment the farmer in North Dakota indicated the character of work he would be expected to do side by side with one of the farmer's own sons in taking care of the crop of any year. I am certain it would be a failure.

I remember some years ago there were sent from England to Minnesota a number of boys, with the idea that they would be taught farming. They were the sons of well-to-do men, and they had no employment in England. Some of them committed suicide, others died because of the hardships, and none became successful farmers. So the average boy who is brought up in the city can not do farm work. I admit that those who are used to shoveling all day long and doing that kind of work could possibly perform farm labor. But, Mr. President, getting right back, you have got to fix a price that will be satisfactory to both the consuming public and the producing public. If you are to allow the farmer for his son and his wife and his daughter the prices you pay here in the city of Washington for a colored laborer, for a colored cook, or for a colored table waiter, you are not going to get any wheat for $2 a bushel, or even $2.50 a bushel. What the farmer has been suffering from all of these years, and that which has created more discontent than anything else in the world, is that as a matter of fact, with an ordinary crop, the net earnings of the farmer and his sons and grown-up daughters do not exceed 20 cents a day, as against $1.25 an hour for your carpenter, for your plasterer, for your paperhanger, for your bricklayer, or for anyone else engaged in the building trades.

While I am on that subject, we are complaining about the high cost of articles at retail. I do not know many of the retailers that are making any exorbitant profits. I know they charge very heavy prices; and it is surprising, when you recall the manufacturer's price of a given article, and buy the same thing in any retail store here, to find that it has increased from several hundred to several thousand per cent; but what is the trouble? You have got to construct houses to live in; you have got to have buildings in which to do business and if the brickmaker and the bricklayer and the carpenter and the plasterer and the paperhanger and everyone else, including the plumber, must have prices that will range from seven to ten dollars a day, how in Heaven's name can you expect the retailer to sell goods very cheaply in those costly edifices? How can you expect the clerk, who is receiving $2 a day, or the laborer, who is receiving from $2 to $2.50 a day, to live well when he must purchase his products in structures that are built with labor costing from $10 to $15 per day? When you get right down to the real question, it is that maladjustment in the labor market to-day that is at the bottom of all of your high prices in the city.

I will elucidate that more when I come to discuss the amendment, and when that amendment is before the Senate. I simply give out these little feelers in order that you may give the matter some thought and some consideration, and see if you can not arrive at the real trouble that is afflicting our body politic to-day.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. I know that the Senator is anxious to be accurate. I live in New York City, and I build houses occasionally. The average wage of a mechanic approximates $5 a day in New York City. In some of the trades the wage is higher. The bricklayers get as high as $6 a day. That is the highest wage paid to any mechanic in the building trades. I will say to the Senator, though, that the common labor, the unskilled laborer, the man who mixes the mortar in the street and carries the brick and mortar up to the man who lays the brick, is paid to-day from $3.50 to $4 a day. The time is coming, too, I will say to the Senator, unless we secure more common labor for New York and the other large cities, when the unskilled laborer will be paid as much as the skilled laborer; but the wages are not in the neighborhood of $10 or $15 a day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, out here to-day and next Sunday carpenters will be working and receiving $14 a day—$7 for week days and double price on Sunday—for eight hours' labor, so I am informed. Why, in my State last fall a banker was putting up a little building. I asked him what he was paying. He said he was paying the brick men $10 a day. Now, as a rule, these wages are much less out in the West than they are in your cities, and they are running here all the way from $1 even up to $1.25 an hour for some of the labor.

Mr. CALDER. I employ these men myself in my State.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes; I know they run five and six and eight dollars a day; but remember that the farmer gets but 20 cents a day as against your six and eight dollars a day.

Mr. CALDER. He has my sympathy; but of late, Mr. President, it may be said that he has been "getting his."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. In fixing prices and in legislation of this kind, I wish to inquire from the Senator whether he has not heard the experience of other countries referred to, especially England? I think we all have; and I should like to add, if the Senator will permit me, at the close of his remarks, an extract from the Corn Trade News, of Liverpool, England, edited by George Broomhall, who is a statistician of world-wide note, whose ability we all recognize, in which this language occurs:

The international wheat market finds itself, as it were, in two watertight compartments. In North America supplies available are abundant, with prices fluctuating widely from week to week. In Europe the supplies available for millers are severely restricted by Government regulations, prices meanwhile are held firmly at a high level, or, in the case of native wheat, which is still a free market, prices are steadily mounting upward, as high as 89s. per 504 pounds having been realized on at least one provincial market yesterday, a rise of nearly 30s. per quarter since the wheat commission was called into existence last October to check the exploitation of the public by corn merchants and others and to conserve the supply of foodstuffs in the United Kingdom. This persistent rise in the price of wheat in this country affords a good instance of the powerlessness of a government department in combating natural economic laws. No one in his senses would think of accusing the royal wheat commission of the intention of exploiting the public in the matter of its food supply, but the fact remains that since the commission came into existence the position of the consumer in this country has greatly worsened in every respect. During the first two years of the war, before the wheat commission was called into existence, we had some experience of fits of high prices; for instance, English wheat rose as high as 62s. a quarter in the year 1915, and as high as 60s. a quarter in the year 1916; but as offsets to these high prices there were periods in each year of low prices; for instance, in 1915 the price fell as low as 42s. 9d., and in the first nine months of 1916, before the commission came into existence, it fell as low as 46s. 3d. During the past five months, since the wheat commission has held control, prices from a consumer's point of view have gone from bad to worse, rising in the case of British wheat by over £1 per quarter, and in the case of foreign wheat by 10s. or 15s. a quarter. Flour has risen 10s. a sack and been reduced in quality by several shillings. Millers' sharps have risen about £2 a ton and bran about £5 per ton. Maize, oats, and barley have risen proportionately.

We show in a tabular form the course of prices of British wheat since the outbreak of war:

Price of British wheat per quarter of 480 pounds, since outbreak of war, during four periods of time.

	Lowest.	Highest.	Average period.
	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
1914, between Aug. 4 and Dec. 31	34 9	43 3	39 0
1915, 12 months	42 9	62 0	53 0
1916, 9 months, whole market was free	46 3	60 0	55 2
Period during which wheat commission has had control, Oct. 19 to date	[1]59 2	[2]82 0	72 [illegible]

[1] Price ruling when commission began operations.
[2] Average price to-day for whole country per 480 lbs.

We think the course of events, as outlined above, should convince the newspaper critic and the thoughtless public speaker that the charge brought against the wheat merchant of exploiting the public may have been ill founded. If a Government department in full control of a market can not prevent prices from rising, what chance has a mere merchant of making his influence felt?

In North America, as we have said, prices are fluctuating widely from week to week. During the past week the swing of the market has been upward, May wheat in Chicago, St. Louis, and Kansas City having advanced about 8 cents per bushel; in Duluth and Minneapolis, 6 to 7 cents per bushel. July wheat on the winter-wheat markets advanced about 5½ cents per bushel; in Duluth and Minneapolis, 7 cents per bushel. September wheat in Chicago advanced 3 cents per bushel. In Winnipeg, May advanced 4¼ cents per bushel, July 3¾ cents per bushel, October 5¼ cents per bushel. The South American markets, Rosario and Buenos Aires, have advanced 40 to 50 cents per bushel (10 cents per bushel is the equivalent of about 4½d. per quarter).

Mr. McCUMBER. I have understood that general criticism has been leveled against the action taken in Great Britain, but I have nothing more than those reports to go by.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I spoke a day or two ago upon this bill, I made some allusion to the current and widely diffused reports in regard to the intent of the gentlemen who were to be invested by this bill with power in regard to making prices for sugar. I said that I had heard that they were endeavoring to make a price to the domestic producer which would leave him little or no profit, because he had already made his beet contracts, and then I referred particularly to Cuba. It must be remembered that the Cuban sugar, duty paid, makes the price in this country.

I had heard it said, on what I thought good authority, that it was the intention of the controllers of food to compel Cuba to make a very low price, and to compel her to do so by withholding foodstuffs from the island. I thought, apart from the economic objections, that to treat, with an absolute disregard of treaties, a country which is our ally, and virtually under our protection, and which has followed us into the war, would be a very great mistake.

I received this morning a letter from Mr. Hoover telling me that the reports to which I have referred—the rumors, if you choose to call them so—were wholly unfounded so far as he was concerned.

I am extremely glad to hear it. I wanted to make this statement, because he was kind enough to write me a letter saying that they had no foundation; and I am very glad to know from so high an authority, who is to be charged, certainly in large measure, with fixing the food prices in this country, that he did not intend to compel Cuba to make an unduly low price on her sugar.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that I believe, too, that he was corroborated in the statement by the representative of the beet-sugar interests.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes. Mr. Hoover sent me a letter from the representative of the organization, Mr. Peterkin, saying that they were satisfied with the arrangement which had been made with them. Precisely what that arrangement was I do not know, but if they are satisfied it shows that Cuba has received proper treatment, because it would be impossible to fix the domestic price without regard to the Cuban price.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. It might be suggested that if what is commonly known as the Sugar Trust is satisfied with the price agreed upon, the consumer may not be so well pleased. So far as I am concerned, I should like to know what that agreement in regard to price was.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the gentleman whose letter Mr. Hoover inclosed did not represent in any respect what is known as the Sugar Trust. He did not represent the refiners. He represented the beet-sugar interest in this country.

Mr. HARDWICK. In which the Sugar Trust has a considerable interest.

Mr. LODGE. It may possibly have a dispassionate interest in it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Dispassionate? It has a financial interest.

Mr. LODGE. At all events, Mr. Peterkin, who is the head, said that he was satisfied with it. What prices have been made for the country by the beet-sugar people and Mr. Hoover, of course I do not know. That was not stated to me.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he does not think that the public have such an interest in this matter that they have really a right to know what agreement has been made in regard to one of the prime necessities of life?

Mr. LODGE. I think it will be disclosed in time. Of course, the price fixing was done, I assume—it must have been—by fixing the price on Cuban sugar; so much on the raw sugar in Cuba, so much for freights, so much for refining, so much for sales, and as good a differential as the beet-sugar people could get for their additional cost of transportation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, will he please tell me how, even if we pass this bill, Mr. Hoover could possibly do that?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know how he could do it. Apparently he has done it without the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. He could not do it with the bill, to save his soul, in my judgment; and I know something about beet sugar.

Mr. LODGE. I only know what was said to me. He said that the rumors I had referred to in regard to the fixing of prices in Cuba were unfounded, and he inclosed a letter from the representative of the beet-sugar interests in which he spoke of the entirely satisfactory character of the arrangements made with Mr. Hoover.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, he has consulted them about it?

Mr. LODGE. He consulted them; certainly. They are the chief domestic producers. I do not know whether he consulted the Louisiana people or not or whether he consulted the Hawaiians or the Porto Ricans. The person who expressed satisfaction was the representative of the beet-sugar interests; and, as I say, it must be by fixing the price on Cuban sugar, because the imported sugar, duty paid, fixes the price.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. They must have made some agreement that Cuban sugar, duty paid, and with all the additions that I have mentioned, should not go above a certain price, and that was satisfactory to the representative of the beet-sugar interests.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything about this matter, but it happens that sugar is one of the few things connected with the tariff that I do know something about. It is utterly impossible for Mr. Hoover, even if we pass this bill, to regulate the price that we will pay for Cuban raws, unless Cuba undertakes to regulate by law in her own country what price they shall bring there; but that is neither here nor there. It looks to me like a marvelous proposition that this gentleman, who holds no office, who has no official position in this Republic, to presume and assume to go around and make agreements with different interests about what he is going to do after we pass a law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I do not want to be misunderstood. Mr. Hoover sent me this letter, and he also sent a copy of it to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] in charge of the bill, who thougnt it would be well that I should make a statement saying that those reports to which I have referred were unfounded——

Mr. HARDWICK. I am not criticizing the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. LODGE. And I am very glad to do it, because I do not wish to do injustice to anybody.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator understands that I am not criticizing him. I was simply wondering by what power, by what right, by what authority, Mr. Hoover assumes to be making arrangements, in advance, about prices, when he has no authority of law to do it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I got the impression from what the Senator from Massachusetts said that Mr. Hoover has already fixed the price of sugar.

Mr. HARDWICK. It seems so; so what does it matter whether we enact any law or not? Of course, I do not think there is much necessity to do it; it seems that authority is to be assumed and exercised, anyhow.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. It seems to me that it might throw some light on the proposition under discussion if we had a copy of the letter.

Mr. LODGE. It is in my office.

Mr. WATSON. I gathered from the language of the Senator from Massachusetts that Mr. Hoover had denied making any attempt to fix prices in Cuba, but stated finally that they had been fixed to the satisfaction of the sugar interests.

Mr. LODGE. Not the Cuban sugar; to the satisfaction of the representative of the beet-sugar interests in this country; and I said they must take the Cuban sugar to fix the price, because the duty-paid imported sugar necessarily fixes the price.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wonder if anybody has consulted the consumer? Does the letter say that anybody has consulted the consumers of sugar?

Mr. LODGE. That is not mentioned in the letter.

Mr. HARDWICK. Would the Senator mind reading the letter in my time? I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let us have the letter read.

Mr. LODGE. I will read the letter. Mr. Hoover sent copies to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and it is quicker to read that than to send to my office for the original:

JULY 11, 1917.

Hon. HENRY C. LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to your statement in the Senate, as shown in the first column, page 4883, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as to the propositions which you quote having been made in fixing the price of sugar.

Those are the propositions I have explained.

I am, of course, unaware from whom you received these statements, and I can not believe they refer to the situation as interpreted by anyone associated with me. In this connection the inclosed letter from the chairman of the beet-sugar producers' committee should, I think, entirely clear up your mind.

The statement made by you is causing some anxiety.

Yours, faithfully,

HERBERT C. HOOVER.

I was told subsequently that that was anxiety among the sugar growers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, can we have the other letter?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I am going to read it:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 11, 1917.

Mr. HERBERT C. HOOVER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I was surprised to read the statement of Senator LODGE in the Senate yesterday, apparently referring to your attitude toward the beet-sugar producers and the Cuban producers. The whole discussion with you by our representatives of the beet-sugar industry has been in the direction of stimulating production, protecting the producer, and stabilizing the price, in cooperation with the industry, so as to eliminate the speculator and to prevent practices which lead to extortion of the consumer. In all this constructive program we are and have been in perfect accord, and the beet-sugar producers unhesitatingly pledged their support to your administration and proposed plans. I feel that Senator LODGE must have been misinformed as to your attitude in the matter.

Very truly, yours,

W. L. PETERKIN,
Chairman Committee on National Affairs,
United States Sugar Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Presdent, a more remarkable correspondence was never disclosed to public view. With the sugar interests of this country getting profits that are so fabulous that they stagger the imagination, with the sugar producers of this country getting profits so stupendous that they are unequalled in the history of the industry in all the world, how beautiful and disinterested it was to assure them that in order "to stimulate sugar production" the Government is going to take care of their prices; it is a proposal that does not particularly appeal to me. It seems to me that they had better be consulting with somebody about some way to get the price of sugar down. I do not know by what authority Mr. Hoover is making these arrangements. I do not suppose it is official, because I am not aware of any office that the gentleman holds, yet, at least. But I do not suppose it is necessary, in these days, to wait to exercise the functions of an office until the office is created, or to wait to exercise powers until those powers are lawfully conferred.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KENDRICK. In answer to the statement made by the Senator from Georgia that he would like to see the prices reduced, I wish to state that I was told yesterday by a man high up in the councils of the Western Sugar Co. that there was an abundance of sugar in sight, and that if there was no further agitation of the price it would have to go down from $1.50 to $2 a hundred.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am very glad to get that information. It ought to do it, but the trouble is that there is a scarcity of sugar all over the world. We might just as well look the economic facts in the face, and the chances are that sugar is going higher instead of going down. There is no doubt about that in my opinion.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I asked this gentleman particularly as to the supply, and I have occasion to know that he is well informed. He referred not only to the supply in this country but to the supply in Cuba and one of the other great producing countries, and he said it was a mistaken idea that there was a very great scarcity of sugar.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am sorry to inform the Senator from Wyoming that the gentleman in question, in my judgment, is utterly mistaken, and I have studied this question for years. You can read any of the English trade journals, any of the European trade reports, any of the market or crop reports anywhere, and nobody on earth has the idea that sugar is likely to go down during this war to any considerable extent. Its necessary tendency is upward.

The thing I am objecting to is that this man, without the slightest authority to do it, seems to have agreed already to a specific price for which he is going to tax the American consumer of sugar everywhere—$6.75, I believe, was suggested. Was not that figure in the letter? At all events, I understood it to be that figure. I am amazed at the performance, in its entirety. If there is anybody on this earth, in this country, that does not need any fostering care or protection from the Government at this time, it is the sugar producer, whether he lives in Louisiana or in the West.

Now, Mr. President, that is all I want to say on that subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this point, if he is going on to another subject?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call attention to a statement that has been made. It is generally understood throughout the United States that there is a scarcity of sugar in all the world. As far as the United States is concerned, and as far as all of our allies are concerned, and as far as the balance of the world is concerned outside of Germany and her allies, there is ample sugar to take care of all of the people of the world.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would rather the Senator would make his argument in his own time. I do not want to yield further just now. The Senator can make his argument when I get through with mine.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator was going to leave that subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I am not going to leave that subject. Sugar is higher to-day in England than it is in America. It is higher to-day in France than it is in America.

Mr. SMOOT. At retail?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; and at wholesale.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, well, I disagree with the Senator about the facts, then, and I think I know.

Mr. SMOOT. I can show the Senator telegrams on that subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not care anything about the telegrams. I have some documents, too. But anyhow, Mr. President, the man who needs protection in this sugar business is not the sugar producer, but the sugar consumer in this country. The men who need help, if any help is to be given on these industrial questions by Government action, are not the opulent sugar manufacturers of this country, whether they are located in the South or the West, but the great masses who consume the sugar of the country. As I have said, before we went into this war—of course it has hardly touched us yet in its industrial aspects—sugar was higher in this country than it was in England or in France. I do not know to what extent Mr. Hoover has authority to settle all of our problems, economic and industrial, to fix prices in advance of any authority conferred on him by law to do so—an authority that I hope will never be conferred on him by law, and that certainly will never be conferred on him by law with my consent, if he is to have such authority.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am very much in sympathy with some of the views expressed by the Senator; but does not the Senator think that, in the light of the demands which have been made—the extortionate demands by the steel companies and some other companies which are selling their products to the United States—it was wise to vest in the President and in the Secretary of War in some of the measures that have heretofore become law authority to fix prices with respect to articles which the United States must have in the prosecution of the war?

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator means with respect to articles needed by the Government to prosecute the war?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator may be right about that. I am not prepared to say. But look at this sugar proposition. The relief that we need, if we need any—I think we do—is the relief that the American housewife needs. The relief that we need is the relief that the consumer needs. Yet this man who is going to administer this law goes to dickering with the producers, in order to guarantee their priee, instead of trying to do something to get it down for the American consumer. I think that is a pretty plain indication of what we may expect from such administration.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, without going into that question, it appears that when our country is at war there is a desire upon the part of many people to exact, not only from the Government but from the citizen consumer, extortionate prices; and it seems to me that we will inevitably be driven sooner or later, if this war shall last for any length of time, to the position of authorizing some one to fix prices for the things required by the Government.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I have said about all I wanted to say and I want to yield the floor. If that is true, and the Senator does it for that reason, we are getting the boot on the other leg as fast as we can, because if we get any precise knowledge about it it is not to endeavor to reduce the price of our sugar, but it is to guarantee to these beet-sugar factories that we will keep the price up. Is that the reason why the Senator thinks we ought to have a food administrator, to keep the prices up?

Mr. KING. I was not expressing an opinion in regard to a food administrator, or the wisdom or necessity of controlling the prices of any article or commodity except such as were imperatively required by the Government to raise and support the armies and to equip the Navy and to carry on the war.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think I ought to say——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I understand it is simply that the sugar producers agreed that the price should not go further than a certain point, whatever that point is. There is nothing to prevent its going lower.

Mr. HARDWICK. What is the statement of the Senator?

Mr. LODGE. I say, as I understand it, the agreement simply is by the producers that the price of sugar shall not go up above a certain point.

Mr. HARDWICK. I did not understand it that way. Has the Senator the language of the proposition?

Mr. LODGE. That is what I understand, that the agreement among the producers is that they will not allow sugar to go above a certain point; but if the operation of the economical laws of supply and demand carry it lower, there is no agreement that it shall not go lower.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like very much to be informed upon that point. Has the Senator the language upon which he bases that statement?

Mr. LODGE. No; I am simply stating the fact in my own language; that is all.

Mr. HARDWICK. Where does the Senator get that information?

Mr. LODGE. That is merely my understanding of their agreement.

Mr. HARDWICK. An agreement made by whom?

Mr. LODGE. That is what I understand to be the agreement. It may be contradicted to-morrow, but that is my understanding of the agreement.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish to see the letters, if I may.

Mr. LODGE. I gave it to the official reporter.

Mr. HARDWICK. Until I have them I can not tell what sort of an agreement they made. These agreements, of course, are made by people who have no authority to make them whatever, and they do not take the public into their confidence. This is the first I have ever heard of it. I suppose it will be news to the public. Of course it will be very gratifying, indeed, if it is discovered that the real agreement with these sugar producers is that it is to reduce these abnormally high prices of sugar. I will be very much gratified if that is true. I say that unhesitatingly. But if this letter means what I think it does, it is no indication that that was the character of their agreement at all. Mr. Herbert Hoover, who has very fine stationery, does not say what office he holds or what duties he discharges, just "Herbert Hoover, Washington." Royal purple is the color, and he addresses this letter to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I do not want to be misunderstood. I do not disprove at all of having the sugar industries understand that they are not to be forced down to an unreasonable price. I think it is very proper, because I am a member of the committee on taxation, and I want to get excess profits out of them.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator has always taken that side of the question. I am not surprised at it. I do not approve of any such policy as that; and never have, and never will.

Hon. HENRY C. LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to your statement in the Senate, as shown in the first column, page 4883, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as to the propositions which you quote as having been made in fixing the price of sugar.

I am, of course, unaware from whom you received these statements, and I can not believe they refer to the situation as interpreted by anyone associated with me.

Who are his associates? What does he represent? Who are his associates, anyhow?

In this connection the inclosed letter from the chairman of the beet-sugar producers' committee should, I think, entirely clear up your mind.

The statement made by you is causing some anxiety.

To whom? To these sugar people, the sugar producers, I reckon, and he evidently has some understanding with them. I am just a little suspicious of the authority that starts out with having an understanding secretly, until it comes to light in this way, with producing interests rather than taking the consuming public into their confidence at one and the same time.

Now, what is this letter?—

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 11, 1917.

Mr. HERBERT HOOVER.
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I was surprised—

Which is from the real beet-sugar interests; I know this man or what his connection is and what his affiliations are. He is frankly the representative of the beet-sugar producing companies of this country and writes in their interest, of course—

I was surprised to read the statement of Senator LODGE in the Senate yesterday apparently referring to your attitude toward the beet-sugar producers and the Cuban producers. The whole discussion with you by our representatives of the beet-sugar industry has been in the direction of stimulating production—

Here is what this man said. He has said nothing about the consumer yet:

protecting the producer—

Not the consumer—

and stabilizing the price in cooperation with the industry so as to eliminate the speculator and to prevent practices which lead to extortion of the consumer.

That is all they propose. First, they want to stimulate production—but it is stimulated now to a point the world has never seen equaled in its history—and to stabilize production, to stimulate production, protecting the producer. The only thing proposed to do for the poor consumer is to see that too many middlemen do not rob him too atrociously. If we are to have any such food control as that, in the interest of the masses of the citizens who are suffering and who want lower prices, God help us all!

Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything about the sugar question, but I want to have the Secretary read in my time before I take my seat the statement of the Secretary of War about the advisory committee of the Council of National Defense. I ask that that be done in justice to myself as well as the Secretary of War, and so that the Senate and the country may have the precise information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read, and was interrupted by Mr. HARDWICK. At the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon, I ask that the balance, down to the heading "Unexpended balance of former appropriation," may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. NEWTON D. BAKER, SECRETARY OF WAR.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the immediate matter you wanted to bring to our attention, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary BAKER. It was the item of $500,000 for the Council of National Defense.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, will you give us some light on that?

Secretary BAKER. I want to tell you just what the Council of National Defense is doing and what it is likely to have to do.

There is a bill in the House, 4210, introduced by Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts, making a separate appropriation of $500,000 for the Council of National Defense, and I saw Mr. CARTER about it and asked him to hold it over because that was under discussion here, and it did not seem as if it ought to be in two places.

The Council of National Defense, proper, consists of six Cabinet officers, including the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor. Then there is an advisory committee appointed by the President, and that is headed by Daniel Willard, the president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and it has on it Julius Rosenwald and Franklin H. Martin, of Chicago, and Howard E. Coffin, of the automobile industry, and the others are immaterial to name, although important to the work.

What that body is doing at present is being the center of what in England ultimately came to be the munitions board and supply department. They are organizing every industry in this country in such a way that it deals with the Government through a single head or committee. For instance, they send out and ask all the men who deal in shoes and make shoes to get together in conference and appoint a committee that can deal with the Government. Then when we want to buy 500,000 pairs of shoes for the Army, that board knows the whole shoe trade, and knowing exactly what contracts for shoes there are for our allies, and knowing what the necessities are for shoes in the Navy and in the country at large, it picks out the factories that can be best spared, or are best equipped to make Army shoes, and it knows what previous contracts they have had with the War Department, and it sends word to the War Department: "Brown & Co., of St. Louis, is the best company to make your shoes, and we will keep them free so that they will be free from other engagements to make your shoes."

In the same way they take the cloth manufacturers and find out what the supply of wool is, and they look over the raw material market, and they say to John Jones, "You must stop making some less useful kinds of cloth and start to making Army cloth, and you can get your material from this part of the wool industry, and we will secure a relaxation of the embargo on foreign wool so that you can get the material." They are surveying the whole business field in this country all the time and preparing the facilities for making contracts.

The seven men who are presiding get no pay. They are appointing committees of each trade and each industry. They are not receiving anything for their services, but it requires the accumulation of a clerical force to tabulate their results. They now have three floors of the Munsey Building, and they will probably have to have more floors of the Munsey Building.

Senator HARDWICK. Can not all that be done by the heads of the executive departments?

Secretary BAKER. It would be the same thing, and it would be done less efficiently. I will answer that question just by making this observation. I want to make an illustration of a thing that has just been done. We need in this country an enormous increase in the forging capacity for steel forgings for making armor. The capacity required for making 3-inch guns and 8-inch guns is enormously in excess of the capacity of the Midvale and the Army works for forgings. This board has had half a dozen of the best steel experts in the Nation working without pay for weeks on that matter.

Senator HARDWICK. I wonder why the heads of the departments who have to get these things made can not have those things done.

Secretary BAKER. I will answer that right away. We will assume that that service is a tremendously valuable service.

Senator HARDWICK. Yes; of course it must be done.

Secretary BAKER. The reason why it would not be any cheaper to have it done if the Secretaries of the departments undertook to do it is that they would have to do it through paid employees.

Senator HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.

Secretary BAKER. Now, this board is doing it; and more than half of all the service of the board is voluntary service, not paid, service of the highest character, service of people who could not be employed. For instance, we could not hire Mr. Charles Schwab.

Senator HARDWICK. The Secretary of War, in an emergency like that, it seems to me, could get him.

Secretary BAKER. There is no real way, in an emergency, in which he could work in with the Secretary as he can with a board of which he is a member.

The CHAIRMAN. Excuse me a moment. This has been established by law.

Senator HARDWICK. Its operations seem extraordinary as well as its cost, and that is the reason I am inquiring into them.

Secretary BAKER. I am anxious to have you do it.

The second answer I want to make to you about the Council of National Defense doing this instead of the departments is that the Council of National Defense does consist of six Cabinet officers, and they have the entire power. All the rest of it is merely advisory. All of this $500 000 is to be spent by these six Cabinet officers and not by some third agent. The necessity for having it as a fixed appropriation is that it touches all of the departments, and it is a centralization of the points at which these six departments come together, and this makes it a separate appropriation instead of having six appropriations and having it distributed from the six Cabinet officers into a common fund.

Senator SMOOT. What I would like is to have you give your opinion as to the amount. Five hundred thousand dollars for clerk hire is a lot of money.

Secretary BAKER. Of course, Senator, it will not all be for clerk hire. It is not clerk hire in that sense. It is transportation expenses sometimes.

Senator SMOOT. Of course, there will be some expenses of that kind.

Secretary BAKER. There is a good deal of that. For instance, when you undertake to correlate the aeroplane industry of the country, and you send to every place where aeorplanes are made and get the pres-

dents of those companies to come down to Washington and get together to try to standardize specifications, and consult together about the aeroplane industry——

Senator SMOOT. Would not a letter bring them?

Secretary BAKER. A letter brings them, but sometimes it is necessary to pay their expenses. Ordinarily it is not. A good deal of money is spent in just paying the traveling expenses of people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would not take the time of the Senate now to refer to the sugar question but for one reason. I should like to have the people of the United States know that there is no scarcity of sugar. The crop of sugar this year is phenomenal not only in Cuba, Porto Rico, the Sandwich Islands, the cane sugar in the Southern States, and the beet sugar of this country.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator's statement in regard to Porto Rico, Hawaii, and Louisiana is undoubtedly true, but is it true about Cuba? Did not the revolution have some effect on their crop?

Mr. SMOOT. It had some effect upon the crop, but even under the conditions existing it is the largest crop produced in Cuba for years past.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator sure of that? Let me read a statement of Mr. Hoover at the hearing before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, United States Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator I am not going to take over five minutes.

Mr. REED. This will take only a second.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will let the Senator make the statement.

Mr. REED. Mr. Hoover's testimony is very interesting in connection with the Senator's statement in regard to sugar. He says at page 413, part 4, of the hearing:

> The outlook for sugar is very poor. The Cuban crop may be down a million and a quarter tons below the 4,000,000 normal; and, generally, there is a scarcity of sugar in the world.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course Mr. Hoover is wrong in saying that the Cuban crop is 4,000,000 tons normal, but I am not going to discuss those figures at all. I simply want to call attention to the fact that, as far as sugar is concerned, there is no necessity for the American people to get alarmed about the amount of sugar produced this year and available for their consumption.

Mr. President, the beet fields of Germany—the beet fields of Austria—of course, as we all know, are not producing as much sugar as they did before, but the sugar produced in all other parts of the world can not reach Germany and Austria to-day. They are raising sugar enough for their own use and no more. There is nothing to speak of exported from those countries, but the vast increase in the production of sugar in the United States, in the Hawaiian Islands, Cuba, Porto Rico, and in Java particularly, and in the Philippine Islands, has more than made up for all the sugar that Austria or Germany would have exported if normal conditions existed.

Mr. President, I want to say this, because it is a fact: Some three months ago here in the city of Washington there was a sugar scare, and some of the retailers here advanced sugar to 12 cents a pound. There was no necessity for it, and all the sugar producers of the country notified through the press, as far as they could, the people of the country that it was uncalled for; and it was simply a move made by a scare, and profited nobody but the retail sugar men.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that I know personally that at the time to which he refers there was more sugar in the city of Washington than the normal supply. It was rushed here by the American Sugar Refining Co. It was a combination of retail dealers on that occasion which kept sugar up to 12½ cents a pound, and sold only very limited quantities of it.

Mr. SMOOT. When the advance of sugar came in the District to the retail price to which I referred, I telegraphed to New York——

Mr. THOMAS. So did I.

Mr. SMOOT. I telegraphed to New York to find out whether there was a shortage of sugar in the United States sugar market on that day. I received an answer that there was no shortage; that they would fill any order that they would receive from any part of the United States. Yet this increased retail price of sugar in the District lasted for nearly three weeks.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator if he knows what was the wholesale price of sugar in New York at that time?

Mr. SMOOT. The wholesale price of sugar at that time was $7.75.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator another question? What is the price of sugar to-day in New York?

Mr. SMOOT. The last quotation I saw was $7.50. I have not seen a quotation for the last few days.

Mr. GRONNA. In view of the statement the Senator from Utah has made—and I know that no man is better qualified or knows the situation better than the Senator from Utah as to the amount produced—does the Senator think it would be wise to fix the price of sugar now?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not understand that the price of sugar has been fixed. Even in the letter it does not say that any price of sugar has been fixed. It says they came to an understanding as to the stability of the price of sugar in the future. I want to say to the Senator that the sugar producers of this country would very much prefer to have a stable market, they would very much prefer to know that there would be a regular market for sugar, than to have a market up one day and down the next, and speculating upon the curb for the sugar that they produced.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KENDRICK. I should like to say to the Senator from Utah, in corroboration of his statement, that the gentleman to whom I was talking yesterday and to whom I referred made the statement that when this advance occurred in New York his company gave public notice that they would continue to sell sugar at the same price they were selling it without regard to any advances made in New York or in the East.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the statement the Senator has just made is correct. I know there were millions of dollars taken out of the pockets of the consumers of this country by the retail combination that made the people believe there was a shortage of sugar in the world and they could in the future buy only a limited amount.

Mr. President, in relation to the price of sugar in England and France, three weeks ago the quotation for sugar in England was $6.50, and at the same time it was $7.50 in New York, or $1 more in New York than it was in England. That comes about by the $1 tariff that is imposed upon the sugar that we import from Cuba and that is not imposed upon sugar that goes to England. The price was the same barring the fact that we place a tariff tax upon the sugar that was sold in this country.

Mr. President, it is the same to-day. If sugar is $7.40 in the United States, it will be quoted at $6.40 in London. I am speaking about Cuban sugar. I noticed that the other day, after the Finance Committee had agreed that the drawback provision for sugar should be repealed, England immediately placed large orders for Java sugar. I do not know whether that will have any particular effect upon the price of Cuban sugar or not. It certainly will not if there is no more sugar than will be wanted by all the countries of the world, but if there is a surplus of sugar in the world, of course it would affect the price of sugar in Cuba.

Now, I am not going to discuss the drawback provision at this time, because that will be discussed when the revenue bill is before the Senate. But what I want the American people to understand is, that there is no reason whatever for them to become excited over the question of sugar, for there is plenty of sugar for every man, woman, and child in the United States. What the producers of sugar in the United States want is a steady market; and I think, Mr. President, that, when that is understood, there will be a steadier market than there has been in the past.

CANTONMENT OF NINTH DIVISION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of June 27, 1917, certain information relative to the reports of the board of officers appointed to select and designate the site for the cantonment of the Ninth Division, comprising the States of Indiana and Kentucky, and so forth, which will be incorporated in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The communication is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 9, 1917.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Under date of May 6, 1917, I instructed the territorial department commanders to select the sites for those cantonments of the National Army which were to be located within the limits of their respective departments. To aid them in making this selection they were directed to avail themselves of the services of the appropriate staff officers who had been assigned to their headquarters. Each department commander was entirely free to use these services as he thought best. But, whether he visited each proposed site in person and there conferred with his staff officers or whether he found it desirable to form them into a board to make an independent investigation and report their recommendation to him in writing—in either case they were merely his advisers, the department commander being left in this, as in any other military question, with sole responsibility for decision.

In all cases where the department commander made an unqualified decision, with no evidence in the papers nor subsequently submitted which could raise a reasonable doubt as to the soundness of his decision, it received the approval of the War Department. But when that decision was not positive, was qualified by any degree of doubt, or was frankly submitted for the action of the War Department, the question was carefully considered by me in the light of all the evidence originally submitted or that could be otherwise attained by me. In doing this the opinions and evidence offered by Members of the Congress and many other persons were patiently heard and carefully weighed. Decision was suspended until, acting in my executive capacity on this purely executive question, I was satisfied as to the relative merits of sites in controversy. No personal considerations were taken into the slightest account in any case. On the other hand, sole consideration was given to the best interests of the Government, which, in such matters as these, means the health, the comfort, and the facilities for instruction of the citizen soldiers to be provided for in these cantonments. It was a task of large proportions, coming as it did at the same time with many other grave problems pressing for quick solution; nor was it lightened by the many heated controversies between individuals or localities in the course of it.

All the decisions that have been made, whether in the form of approval of a prior decision of a department commander or made in the first instance here, after prolonged and careful consideration, are the decisions of the Secretary of War made in the execution of mandatory law. The records which form part of each case, including the one which is the subject of the Senate resolution herewith, involve more or less bitter controversies between individuals or communities. The reopening of any case means the reopening of these controversies leading to no result other than the accentuation of differences of opinion and without giving any further aid to this department in performing its executive duty.

In connection with the foregoing remarks I submit herewith the reports and recommendations called for by the resolution of the Senate.

Very respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

FINAL REPORT ON SITES FOR CANTONMENTS TO BE LOCATED IN NINTH DIVISIONAL AREA.

Proceedings of a board of officers convened pursuant to paragraph 3, Special Order No. 87, Headquarters, Central Department, Chicago, Ill., May 15, 1917:

[Extract.]

Special Orders, No. 87. } HEADQUARTERS CENTRAL DEPARTMENT, Chicago, Ill., May 15, 1917.

* * * * * * *

3. Pursuant to instructions from the War Department, dated May 4, 1917, the following boards of officers are appointed to investigate and report upon available camp sites for cantonments to be located in the Central Department as follows:

* * * * * * *

(b) Board for cantonment to be located in Ninth Divisional Area (Indiana, Kentucky,: Col Edward M. Lewis, Infantry; Lieut, Col. Oren B Meyer, Fourteenth Cavalry; Maj. E. L. Ruffner, Medical Corps; Capt. Francis B. Wilby, Engineer Corps; Capt. Perry M. Shepard, Quartermaster Reserve Corps.

* * * * * * *

The junior line officer of each board will act as recorder. Each board will assemble without delay at such place as may be indicated by the senior member thereof, and will thence proceed to such points in its respective divisional area as may be necessary to inspect and investigate proposed camp sites. Such journeys as are required under this provision are necessary in the military service.

Boards will be guided in their recommendations by instructions transmitted from the War Department and such other instructions as may from time to time be furnished. Individual reports on sites will be submitted to these headquarters as quickly as they become ready in each case and will be forwarded to reach these headquarters not later than June 3, 1917. Each report will consist of an original and 11 copies.

The travel directed is necessary in the military service.

By command of Maj. Gen. Barry:

H. O. S. HEISTAND,
Adjutant General, Department Adjutant.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., June 2, 1917.

1. The board convened at 10 a. m., May 18, 1917, at Louisville, Ky.: Present, all members, except Col. O. B. Meyer, Fourteenth Cavalry, who joined the board that evening. Delegations from the following cities offering sites for cantonment to be located in the Ninth Divisional Area appeared before the board and were heard: Indianapolis, Ind.; Evansville, Ind.; New Albany and Jeffersonville, Ind.; Louisville, Ky.; Lexington, Ky.

That afternoon (May 18th) the site offered near the city of Louisville was visited and inspected by the board.

On May 19 delegations were received from Terre Haute, Ind.; West Point, Ky.; and Ligonier, Ind.; and the board proceeded to Jeffersonville, Ind., and thence to New Albany, Ind., for the purpose of inspecting a site near those two cities and returned to Louisville.

On May 20 a delegation from Bowling Green, Ky., was received after which the board inspected additional sites offered by the city of Louisville, and in the afternoon proceeded to Lexington, Ky., where a delegation from Danville, Ky., was heard.

On May 21 the board inspected sites offered by the city of Lexington, Ky., and returned to Louisville, where delegations were received from Louisville, Ky., New Albany, and Jeffersonville, Ind., and Huntington, Ind., after which the board proceeded to Bowling Green, Ky.

On May 22 the board inspected sites offered by the city of Bowling Green and then proceeded to Evansville, Ind.

On May 23 delegations were received from Paducah, Ky., and Fort Wayne, Ind., and sites offered by the city of Evansville were inspected by the board, which then proceeded to Terre Haute, Ind.

On May 24 the board inspected sites offered by the city of Terre Haute, and then proceeded to Indianapolis, Ind.

On May 25 the delegations were received from Rochester, Marion, Huntington, and Columbus, Ind., and sites near Indianapolis were inspected by the board.

On May 26 the board proceeded to Fort Benjamin Harrison and inspected site offered by the city of Indianapolis, located near that post, and returned to Indianapolis, where a delegation from Fort Wayne, Ind., was heard.

On May 27 the board worked on the preparation of its reports and then proceeded to Marion, Ind.

On May 28 the board inspected the site offered by the city of Marion; proceeded to Huntington, Ind., and inspected the site offered by that city; proceeded to Fort Wayne, Ind., and inspected the site offered by that city; and returned to Indianapolis.

Since May 29, except on the afternoon and evening of June 1, the board has been at Indianapolis, Ind., engaged in the preparation of its reports, with the exception of one member, Maj. E. L. Ruffner, Medical Corps, who was delegated by the board to make preliminary inspection of the site offered by the city of Paducah, Ky., and proceeded to that place (via Louisville, Ky.) on May 29, returning to Indianapolis (via Louisville, Ky.) on May 30 after inspecting the site offered at Paducah. Upon the recommendation of Maj. Ruffner, as the result of his preliminary inspection, the board decided not to visit Paducah.

On June 1 the board decided that in order to prepare their final report it was necessary to inspect the Jeffersonville and New Albany site a second time in order to satisfy themselves as to whether or not it showed evidence of affording proper drainage after the recent heavy rains. The board therefore on this date proceeded to Jeffersonville, Ind., inspected the proposed site at that place, and returned to Indianapolis the same night for the preparation of its final report.

2. The board has already mailed separate reports covering the following proposed sites to the commanding general, Central Department, on dates given below:

May 27: Louisville, Ky. (supplemental report also mailed June 1); New Albany and Jeffersonville, Ind.; Lexington, Ky.; Bowling Green, Ky.

June 1: Evansville, Ind.; Terre Haute, Ind.; Fort Wayne, Ind.; Marion, Ind.; Huntington, Ind.

June 2: Indianapolis, Ind.; Paducah, Ky.

3. The following proposed sites were considered by the board but not visited, as in the opinion of the board, from the evidence submitted, they did not meet the requirements laid down in instructions transmitted from the War Department: West Point, Ky.; Danville, Ky.; Hopkinsville, Ky.; Columbus, Ind.; Rochester, Ind.; Ligonier, Ind.; Dune Park, Ind.; Crawfordsville, Ind.; Logansport, Ind.

4. Of the sites reported on by the board, three are believed to be not suited for the purpose intended as regards the qualifications laid down in War College memorandum furnished the board for its guidance, and are, therefore, not recommended: Bowling Green, Ky.; Paducah, Ky.; Indianapolis, Ind.

Regarding the Indianapolis site, near Fort Benjamin Harrison, which is offered free for five years, it is believed the site could be utilized if desired in connection with the Government-owned land in the military reservation.

5. The remaining eight sites were believed to be suited for use as cantonment sites, but with varying advantages and disadvantages as given in the separate reports which have been forwarded covering each site. Although the instructions given the board do not call for recommendations as to which is the best site visited, the following conclusions of the board as to the relative merits of these eight sites are submitted:

6. Conclusion: (a) The eight sites may be arranged in the following order with respect to cost to the Government for rental only:

Terre Haute, Ind., offered free for five years, together with about $50,000 cash for improvements.

Lexington, Ky., offered free for five years, "if necessary to secure site."

Louisville, Ky., offered free for two years, after that $10,000 per year.
Evansville, Ind., offered free for one year, after that $30,000 per year.
New Albany and Jeffersonville, Ind., rental of $18,000 per year.
Marion, Ind., rental of $20,000 per year.
Huntington, Ind., rental of from $20,000 to $30,000 per year.
Fort Wayne, Ind., rental of $35,000 per year.

(b) The board is unanimously of the opinion that the site offered at Huntington, Ind., is by far the best cantonment site inspected by the board, provided little weight is attached to the following disadvantages: (1) Not centrally located in training area; (2) longer winters than if located farther south; (3) adjacent city of only 15,000 population; (4) rental price of from $20,000 to $30,000 per year.

(c) Taking all the requirements into consideration, the board is of the opinion that the eight suitable sites should be rated in the following order: First, New Albany and Jeffersonville site; second, Louisville site; third, Evansville site; fourth, Huntington site; fifth, Lexington site; sixth, Terre Haute site; seventh, Marion site; eighth, Fort Wayne site.

(d) It is the opinion of the board that if it should be desired to locate the division in tents rather than in buildings, the order of the sites as given above would be materially modified, with the position of Lexington much nearer the top.

E. M. LEWIS,
Colonel, Infantry, President.
E. L. RUFFNER,
Major, Medical Corps.
F. B. WILBY,
Captain, Corps Engineers.
PERRY M. SHEPARD,
Captain, Quartermaster Reserve Corps.
O. B. MEYER,
Lieut. Colonel, Fourteenth Cavalry, Recorder.

HEADQUARTERS CENTRAL DEPARTMENT,
Chicago, June 4, 1917.

These proceedings are so inconclusive, and there are so many "ifs" about them that it is difficult to come to a determination. There are two States in this district—Indiana and Kentucky. Indiana already has a large camp at Fort Benjamin Harrison, which constrains the opinion that the National Army cantonment site should be in Kentucky. From all the board says, I am inclined to the belief that Lexington, Ky., will prove as satisfactory a site as any, and from an examination of that site and report thereon made by the department inspector, Col. Hunter, and Maj. Hampton, Quartermaster Corps, no mistake, in my opinion, can be made in selecting that site, and I recommend it be selected.

T. H. BARRY,
Major General, Commanding.

[Western Union special.]

CHICAGO, ILL., June 4, 1917.

ADJUTANT GENERAL OF THE ARMY,
Washington:

The boards convened to report upon National Army cantonment sites in the six divisional areas, this department recommend as follows:

Eighth divisional area, including West Virginia and Ohio, board unanimously recommends Chillicothe, Ohio, without rival. Martinsburg, W. Va., second. I approve.

Ninth divisional area, including States of Indiana and Kentucky. Recommendation of board not at all conclusive. Must be considered by War Department. In view of the fact that Indiana, one of the States in the district, has considerable camp at Indianapolis, I believe the other State in the area should have the National Army cantonment. I was much impressed with the Lexington site by reason of reports made upon it by the department inspector and Maj. Hampton, Quartermaster Corps. Of nine sites, arranged only with respect to cost to the Government, the board puts Terre Haute, Ind., first and Lexington second. Attaching little weight to four conditions, the board is unanimously of the opinion that the best site is Huntington, Ind., but taking all the requirements into consideration, of eight sites, the board recommends the New Albany and Jeffersonville, Ind., site first, Louisville second, Lexington fifth, and then makes a fourth recommendation that if the division is put in tents rather than in buildings, states the position of Lexington would be much nearer the top.

The whole report is inconclusive and should be considered by the department before action is taken. If I were called upon to determine, I would recommend Lexington site.

By accepting it I am satisfied no mistake would be made.

Tenth divisional area, including States of Michigan and Wisconsin. The board recommends site at Battle Creek, Mich. I approve.

Eleventh divisional area, State of Illinois. Board recommends Rockford, Ill., first; Dixon, Ill., second. I approve.

Thirteenth divisional area, including States of Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, North and South Dakota. Board recommends in the order named Twin Cities site, Minn.; Des Moines, Iowa; Cedar Rapids, Iowa. I approve.

Fourteenth divisional area, States of Missouri, Kansas, and Colorado. Board recommends in order named Fort Leavenworth, Colorado Springs, and Fort Riley. I approve.

All proceedings except for eighth divisional area go forward June.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
Washington, D. C., June 12, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER (personal),
Secretary of War.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The excuse for this letter is the belief on my part that you are always anxious to secure information of importance to your department and the further belief that I can submit some information of real value.

In last night's paper appeared notice that the concentration camp for Kentucky has been located at Louisville. I do not know whether you passed upon this selection personally or simply left it to the commanding general of the Central Department and to the General Staff, but in either case I feel that you should make some investigation of the site near Louisville proposed to be utilized.

It so happens that I was at Louisville last month when the board appointed by Gen. Barry to inspect camp sites in Kentucky and Indiana came there. In conversation with one of the most prominent business men of that city concerning the land which Louisville had offered that gentleman made the following statement, which I quote practically verbatim:

"Of course, my business would be benefited by the location of a cantonment here. It would mean many millions of dollars annually to Louisville. But, from the standpoint of the Army and from the standpoint of the troops about to be assembled, it would be a crime to accept Louisville's proposition. The land offered is at the falls of the Ohio River. It is cold, crawfish land, infested by mosquitoes, constantly subject to fogs, more noted for the malaria which it gives to all forced to occupy it than for anything else. Much as I am interested in Louisville, I think a more unfit camp site could scarcely be found, and in justice to the truth I feel impelled to express myself."

Mr. Secretary, I can scarcely imagine a more definite or striking indictment of a camp site than was this, voiced by a man whose interests were entirely on the side of that which he condemned. Personally I do not pretend to be unprejudiced. I am so thoroughly acquainted with the desirability of a camp site for Kentucky near Lexington that I think it would be a grave mistake to locate the cantonment elsewhere in the State. As explained to you in personal conversation, I have no interests there. I have been away from Kentucky five and a half years. My property holdings there were disposed of long since. But I have a profound desire that the Government may not make a serious blunder in connection with any of these locations. The health and welfare of the boys being called to the colors is the most important consideration with me and should be with every Member of Congress and every citizen.

I therefore feel justified in urging that you shall hold up the definite selection of Louisville until you can make a thorough investigation of conditions described by one of Louisville's leading citizens. In justice to yourself and in justice to the young soldiers, whose health and life will be at stake, it seems to me you can not do less.

With great respect, I have the honor to be,
Sincerely and cordially, yours, JOUETT SHOUSE.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, June 20, 1917.

From: Lieut. Col. Frederick P. Reynolds, Medical Corps, United States Army.
To: The Adjutant General of the Army.
Subject: Sanitary inspection of site for cantonment at Louisville, Ky.

1. In compliance with orders dated War Department, June 15, 1917 (copy attached), I submit herewith the following report of inspection of the site near Louisville, Ky., selected for cantonment of the National Army, with reference to its availability from a sanitary point of view.

2. The land offered by the Louisville Board of Trade consists of two parts; one for the buildings of the cantonment, the other for drill and maneuver purposes. Misunderstanding may have risen in regard to the use which the last-named part is intended to be put. This is of level and rather low-lying ground, and while quite suitable for use as a drill ground, it is evidently undesirable for camping or cantonment purposes. In the report of the board, dated May 27, 1917, it was suggested that but little of this part need be used for buildings. Since that date additional land suitable for building has been offered which increases the total area of 2,000 acres, 1,000 in each tract.

3. The land included in the part offered for building purposes is partly rolling country with gentle slopes. It is between 500 and 530 feet above sea level and drains toward the city of Louisville. It is excellently drained in all parts. The soil is loam over red clay. The land is largely used for truck farming. Part of it is now in growing crops; the rest is in meadow. There is no standing water on the land or near the tract. There are numerous shade trees on the land. The site adjoins the Audubon Country Club, part of the club's ground being included in the tract. It also adjoins a small residence suburb called Prestonia. From all parts the outlook is pleasing. There is a noticeable absence of dust and glare. The roads are metalled and in good condition. The houses on the tract are occupied by white farmers, and there are no closely settled districts near by.

4. The center of the business section of Louisville is 5 miles distant. The city's water supply is offered for the use of the troops and is already upon the ground. The supply is taken from the Ohio River and is sedimented, filtered, and chlorinated. It is excellent in quality and abundant in quantity. The city undertakes to construct a brick sewer which will care for nearly all the building area. Disposal to be into the city trunk sewers. Should it be impracticable to sewer any part of the area, disposal could satisfactorily be made by means of septic tanks and subsurface porous tile drains. The control of fly and mosquito breeding on the site offers no more difficulties than are found in country districts generally. Malaria is not common in the vicinity. Health conditions in the city do not materially differ from those in other cities in the same part of the country. The social evil is under careful surveillance. There is a restricted district which is being gradually done away with in accordance with the plan formulated by a committee which recently investigated and reported upon the subject. The sale of liquor is licensed in the city. Sunday closing law is strictly enforced.

5. In my opinion the site selected is satisfactory from a sanitary viewpoint.

F. P. REYNOLDS,
Lieutenant Colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, War Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The inclosed is Col. Hunter's report on the Louisville cantonment site in connection with my telegram of this date. I ask your special attention to paragraphs 4, 6, and 8.

Very sincerely, yours,

WAR DEPARTMENT,
HEADQUARTERS CENTRAL DEPARTMENT,
Chicago, June 30, 1917.

From: Col. George K. Hunter, Inspector General.
To: Commanding General Central Department.
Subject: Report upon an inspection of the cantonment camp site at Louisville, Ky.

1. I visited the camp site on June 28, 1917, and went over all of the ground on which it is intended to place buildings, and I went entirely around the tract known as the maneuver area. These two tracts are separated from each other by the Preston Street Road.

2. I find the site to be used for the camp proper is most admirably adapted to the purpose. All of the ground on which buildings will be erected is practically the highest ground in the neighborhood of Louisville. There is a small creek bed running through this tract which will enable the sewer lines to be constructed with proper fall for all. From this camp site fine views are obtainable in all directions.

3. The maneuver ground which is the large tract to the west and south of Preston Street Road has a gradual slope to the south, and it is likely that perhaps as much as one-fourth of this tract might become boggy in the early spring or in a wet season. At the time of my inspection none of this ground was wet; however, I am informed that the county had constructed a ditch leading to the Ohio River to the west of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad and that they are now running three laterals from that ditch to the southern and western portions of the maneuver tract, and when those laterals are completed the tract will be well drained so that it can all be used in any kind of weather. In my judgment there are at least a thousand acres that will always be satisfactory for maneuvering, and, personally, I would prefer to have the lowland undrained so that troops might receive instruction in handling themselves under conditions which will undoubtedly confront them at some time in their service.

4. On June 29 I made another trip to this camp site in company with Mr. F. M. Sackett, president of the Louisville Board of Trade, Mr. J. C. F. Hegewald, of Louisville, and Gen. Roger D. Williams, Kentucky National Guard. On this occasion we viewed all of the camp site and a portion of the maneuver grounds. Gen. Williams expressed his astonishment at what he saw and stated that he could not understand upon what basis the Lexington papers had made their attacks upon this site which was in every way most satisfactory for the purpose.

5. I visited the waterworks of the city and find they are using the most modern methods of treating the Ohio River water, and their daily capacity is over 70,000,000 of gallons, and the present consumption of the city of Louisville is less than 30,000,000 of gallons per day, so that there will be the greatest abundance of most wholesome water.

6. Whilst I inspected the Lexington site and approved of it for the smaller camp needed by the National Guard of Kentucky, I unqualifiedly would prefer the Louisville site for cantonment holding 40,000 men.

7. The barracks buildings are already under construction; the street railway has begun work on double-tracking their road to the camp site; the Southern Railway has commenced work on their sidetracks, and I was informed would put on a shuttle train to the camp from Louisville next week.

8. I have seen some of the most remarkable statements against this camp site, and I wish to state that they have no foundation in fact. If there are any mosquitoes, or have any sickness in this camp, it will be due to the fault of the occupants and not to the location of the site, which should be as healthy as any to be found in the United States.

9. The inclosed map is taken from the Sunday edition, Lexington Herald, June 24, 1917.

GEO. K. HUNTER.

[Western Union special.]

CHICAGO, ILL., June 30, 1917.

HON. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, War Department, Washington:

In view of controversy over selection of Louisville cantonment site, the department inspector, Col. Hunter, went to Louisville to inspect the First Kentucky Infantry. He had inspected and was thoroughly familiar with the Lexington site. When in Louisville, by my direction, he inspected the Louisville cantonment site, and, notwithstanding his knowledge and former report on the Lexington site, he now reported that the Louisville National Army cantonment is beautiful and satisfactory in all respects. He will make a detailed report to-day, which I will forward to you by mail. In forwarding the report on the cantonment site for the ninth divisional area which was inconclusive, I was favorable to the Lexington site because of the former report thereon by board consisting of Col. Hunter and Maj. Hampton.

BARRY.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, with reference to the reply sent by the Secretary of War this afternoon to Senate resolution No. 94, introduced on June 22, I simply desire to say that I can see no profit to anyone in any further discussion of this matter. It is perfectly evident that the cantonment is to remain at Louisville. I desire to add, however, that at no time have I ever entertained the slightest suspicion that the cantonment would be removed from Louisville.

I had but one object, Mr. President, in introducing the resolution, and that was to make sure, if possible, that the troops from my own State of Indiana, as well as those from Kentucky, the two States comprising the ninth district, were given the benefit of the best camp site available within that territory. I am still far from convinced by the report sent here by the Secretary of War that this is the case. However, as I have said, I can see no profit whatever in any further discussion of the matter; but in order that my own motives may be the more fully understood, and in order that it may be plainly shown that I acted not upon impulse but upon information, and that that information came from engineers, residents of the State of Kentucky, I ask that the reports of those engineers be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks, in order that it may appear in conjunction with the report of the Secretary of War.

I am aware of the fact, Mr. President, that these engineers have no official status, but they have reputations to sustain, and those reputations they stake upon the correctness of their reports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. MYERS in the chair]. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the matter referred to by the Senator from Indiana will be printed in the RECORD.

The reports referred to are as follows:

REPORT OF GEORGE MCLEOD, ENGINEER, WHO EXAMINED LOUISVILLE CAMP SITE.

EDITOR LEXINGTON HERALD, Lexington, Ky.:

ENGINEER'S REPORT.

The engineer who examined it Tuesday reports:

Pursuant to your request, I spent some six hours on Tuesday, the 19th, in examination of the training camp site south of Audubon Park and between the Poplar Level Road and the Ash Bottom Road south of Louisville, and beg to submit the following as result of these observations:

I went out the Preston Street Road, crossing the Southern at Prestonia, and examined first that portion of the site which is to be, as I understand it, devoted to the maneuvers, viz, that portion between the Preston Street Road and the Ash Bottom Road.

MANEUVER SITE.

To identify this, I attach hereto a blue print, the hatched portion of which covers the proposed training site. I found approximately 160 acres of land north of Dr. Standiford's old residence, the eastern line of the 160 acres abutting on the Preston Street Road, running thence in a southeasterly direction at approximately right angles to said road, that had apparently been drained by means of agricultural tile and was good farming and gardening land. This was in cultivation.

CRAWFISH BOGS.

The remainder of the 980 acres, some 800 acres, between the Preston Street Road and the Ash Bottom Road is mostly an uncultivated crawfish bog. I drove through this diagonally in a machine, getting out at a number of places and walking over the country. I found that a great portion of the ground was hard and sun baked at present, the crawfish having just begun to make their little houses or mounds. These mounds could be found over practically the entire 800 acres, or at least over that portion I examined—and I gave the 800 acres a close investigation. I brought with me to Lexington, in my car, several of these mounds, one reaching here in very good shape, which is on exhibition in the window of the Fayette Drug Co., together with the soil of another that was broken in the trip and photographs of the land. These crawfish mounds indicate very clearly the wet subsoil.

FIT ONLY FOR A SNIPE BOG.

Having been a resident of Louisville all during my boyhood days, I was thoroughly familiar with this section. I have hunted snipe and the Carolina rail over practically all of this property, now belonging to Dr. Bailey, which formerly belonged to Dr. Standiford. It is eminently qualified for a snipe bog, and that is practically the only use it has ever been put to.

There are scattered plantings of corn, none of which, by the way, had been cultivated this spring, cultivation only having started within the last day or so, owing to the extreme wet condition of the soil. A large part of this 800 acres in the spring, fall, and winter is and always has been covered with water. This I know of my own knowledge, and, furthermore, it is easily to be seen by anyone who will take the trouble to walk over it that this is true by observation of the innumerable crawfish mounds, which indicate that to-day just a short distance below the surface the subsoil is saturated with water.

NO GRASS OR SOD.

There is no grass or sod on the entire 800 acres beyond a few acres of poor timothy, the great majority of the acreage being entirely left to lie waste because it is not of the character that would bear tilling.

WATER STANDING IN WOODS.

I found Tuesday that in spite of the fact that farmers who are tilling the soil, cultivating onions and potatoes on that portion of the land along the Preston Street Road which has been drained by the use of agricultural tile, were looking forward to a rain, that water was standing in the woods between the Ash Bottom Road and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, which woods were included within the proposed maneuver site. These wooded portions of this 800 acres should make excellent breeding grounds for mosquitoes, as the shade is there, and the wet, soggy ground.

While in the dry, hot season of the summer this ground will be hard and when the few crops which are grown on it are removed will give fairly good results for maneuvers, unless the soldiers find the stepping over the crawfish mounds difficult, in the wet season of spring it will be slippery, wet, and boggy, and absolutely unfit for drilling. An examination will show that there is no sod beyond a limited amount of timothy, above mentioned, the remainder being all bare, thick white clay, which takes the place of soil on this 800 acres.

TESTIMONY OF RESIDENTS.

This observation was borne out by remarks of the farmers in the neighborhood. Mr. Mike Brightenstein, who farms a small place across the Preston Street Road about half a mile north of the old Standiford residence, and directly across the Preston Street Road from that portion of the maneuver ground which abuts on this road, stated to me that the reason practically none of the 980 acres beyond the 160 acres directly across the road from him was cultivated was because of the fact that in the spring and fall and during all the wet season water laid on it, rendering it too wet to cultivate, and that in the hot weather of the summer it was too hard for decent cultivation; that until it was properly drained by the use of agricultural subsoil tiling, connecting with ditches, that it would never be used for agricultural purposes.

This was also borne out by the testimony of Mr. John Kahney, who lives southwest of the Standiford residence and across the lane from that portion of the Standiford farm which has been reserved and is not included in the offered site. While he seemed to be very anxious that the training camp should be located on the Standiford property and was guarded in his remarks, his wife, who was working in the field with him, told me that this land was not suitable for cultivation owing to being "crawfishy" resulting in thousands of crawfish mounds coming out through the dry, sun-baked clay in the summer and being more or less covered with water in the wet and rainy seasons of the spring, fall, and winter.

DIRT ROADS IN SITE.

This 980 acres is well supplied with macadamized roads on the east and west, with a fairly good macadamized road on the south. The roads through the property are nothing more than dirt roads, which will be practically impassable for haulage in wet weather.

CHARACTER OF BUILDINGS.

I also investigated the buildings on this 980 acres and found them all of the most dilapidated kind, the residences and barns being in the very worst of order, as might be expected from the character of the ground itself.

CAMP SITES.

After examining the maneuver site, I crossed the Preston Street Road to examine the three or four locations on the east side of that road, the largest of which is situated between the Preston Street Road and the Poplar Level Road, the next largest being just east of the Poplar Level Road. These are rather irregular in shape, the larger proportion being bounded on the north by the land of the Audubon Park Club.

NO BLUE GRASS.

I had been told that this ground to the east of the Preston Street Road—which is described as the camp site—was largely in blue grass. This, I found, is not a fact. If there is any blue grass on any of this property set aside for the camp, I was unable to find it, and I looked very carefully for it. The Audubon Club golf links, some 80 acres, I would judge, which I believe the Louisville people are trying to add to the encampment site, is very nicely covered with grass sod, which it has taken several years to secure.

COVERED WITH TIMOTHY AND WEEDS.

A goodly portion of the property which has thus far been set aside for the camp site is in timothy and weeds—rather a poor stand of timothy, with a large portion of white top. This land is considerably higher than that set aside for maneuvers and is of a rough, rolling type—I would say was well drained, and possibly two-thirds of it could be used for the buildings.

TIGHT CLAY SUBSOIL.

It has a tight clay subsoil, a soil which will shed water, but which will hold water in all depressions. Ten acres, I would judge, on the cross pike leading from the Preston Street Road to the Poplar Level Road, bounding the southern edge of the largest tract, has been excavated to the depth of from 4 to 10 feet and the clay hauled away and used for making brick. This, in itself, gives some idea of the character of the soil and the fact that it would be of a water-holding character. This, however, would only apply to the depressions, as the roll of ground would, I think, guarantee fairly satisfactory conditions for the encampment.

RESERVATIONS SCATTERED.

The reservations for this encampment site, as will be noted from the map, are scattered, the main easterly reservation being probably 2½ miles from the maneuver grounds.

ROADS.

The Poplar Level Road, as well as the Preston Street Road, is a well macadamized pike, as is also the crossroad above spoken of leading from the Preston Street Pike to the Poplar Level Road or Pike. The road, however, leading from the Poplar Level Road east and passing south of that portion of the encampment site which lies east of the Poplar Level Road is narrow and the macadam is in miserable condition. I would say that the metal of this pike is not over 8 or 10 feet wide and presents a very bad appearance, in some places water having washed deep ditches along the side of the road in places 4 or 5 feet deep.

REPORT OF WILLIAM A. NEWMAN AND J. WHITE GUYN, ENGINEERS WHO EXAMINED LOUISVILLE CAMP SITE.

LEXINGTON, KY., June 27, 1917.

Hon. J. C. ROGERS,
Mayor Lexington, Ky.

DEAR SIR: At your request we visited the proposed training camp on June 26, located near Louisville, Ky. As indicated on the map furnished us, the maneuver grounds are to the west of the Preston Street Road and the camp site to the east. We spent five hours in making an investigation of the camp site and the maneuver site, beg to report as follows:

CAMP SITE.

The camp site, as indicated on the plat, consists largely of rolling ground, the drainage being to small natural branches. The soil consists of a fine white clay and is covered largely with weeds and white top. A section of some 60 or 70 acres between the Preston Street Road and the Southern Railroad is covered with a fairly good stand of blue-grass sod. Eighty per cent of the camp site is well suited for building and camp purposes. Construction work had started, and there were approximately 500 men engaged in constructing buildings, laying off building sites, erecting poles, laying water lines, and grading for railroad tracks. Approximately 20 construction cars had been placed on a Southern Railway siding, and also other cars loaded with ties, lumber, etc. Numbers of wagons and trucks were delivering material from the city.

MANEUVER SITE.

Leaving the camp site, we proceeded along the Preston Street Road, turning west into a lane which bisects a small section of the maneuver grounds and is the northern boundary of the main maneuver site. A section of the maneuver grounds comprising about 150 acres located on each side of this lane is under cultivation and drains fairly well. After proceeding along or down the lane for 2,500 feet to a point opposite the main body of the maneuver grounds, the area of which is approximately 800 acres, we left our machine and walked through this section for a distance of about 1,800 feet, crossing many drainage ditches which were lined with a thick, heavy undergrowth; in some cases it was necessary for us to cut our way through. We found the surface of all this section hard and dry, dotted with many crawfish mounds. At two points in this walk we used the sounding rod, striking water at a depth of 3½ feet in one place and 3 feet in another. In using the sounding rod we found the first 4 or 5 inches to be very hard; beyond this the rod could be easily pushed down from 3 to 5 feet with but little effort. Returning to the car we proceeded west along the lane to a large field containing about 200 acres, which lies at the intersection of the lane and the Ash Bottom Road. Going through this field, we found it to be sparsely covered with swamp grass and weeds. The surface here was also full of crawfish mounds. There was a corn patch in one corner, containing 10 or 15 acres. Water was again found at an average depth of 2½ feet. We then proceeded down the lane to the Ash Bottom Road, turning south we stopped at a house, the occupants of which had the 200-acre field leased. We inquired at this house for a drink of water and held a conversation with a woman who was born and raised at this place; she said it was seldom that they could produce a crop, the water nearly always drowning it out; that in the winter and spring the soil was very soft and many times it was impossible to even walk over it; that she had seen horses mired while they were cultivating crops on this land, the ground at the time not being sufficiently dry and hard to prevent the horses from breaking through the top surface. It was easy to understand how this could happen by the action of the sounding rod when working it down into the ground, the soil being very soft after going 8 or 10 inches below the surface; at this depth being of about the same consistency as fresh putty, the soil becoming softer and softer until water was reached, at which point it was simply soft, thin mud.

After leaving the house we proceeded south along the Ash Bottom Road, which traverses the main maneuver site; a large section lying between the road and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. We made investigation at many points, and found water a very short distance below the surface, indicating the general drainage of the surface to be from the Preston Street Road west toward the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. Between the Ash Bottom Road and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad there is a large woodland, the boundaries of which are those of the maneuver site. This woodland, comprising some 200 acres, is covered with many large trees and a heavy, swampy undergrowth. The soil of the maneuver site near the woodland is damp in many places, the water being easily reached at a depth of 18 inches. We investigated at other points along the Ash Bottom Road and the lane which forms the southeast boundary line of the maneuver grounds, and found conditions generally the same.

The main body of the maneuver grounds was covered with a system of old drainage ditches from 1 to 3 feet in depth and from 100 to 200 feet apart in an effort to reclaim the land for agricultural purposes; but this was a failure, as only a few acres are now in cultivation.

The entire 800 acres comprises an abandoned, low, flat swamp with a surface sparsely covered with a few weeds, swamp grass, and thousands of crawfish mounds.

WM. A. NEWMAN.
J. WHITE GUYN,
City Engineer, Lexington, Ky.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I do not think the country is interested in any petty contention that may be made by various aspiring localities for the location of cantonments. To my mind, the only vital question is whether Louisville, having secured this cantonment site, has offered a healthful location.

While the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] has put into the RECORD the reports of some engineers or of some private citizens who were sent from the city of Lexington to investigate the site at Louisville, Lexington being a rival for the location of this site, I should like to call the attention of the Senate just briefly to the report from the Secretary of War, which was made by Gen. George K. Hunter, in which he says this about the Louisville site:

On June 29 I made another trip to this camp site in company with Mr. F. M. Sackett, president of the Louisville Board of Trade, Mr. J. C. F. Hegewald, of Louisville, and Gen. Roger D. Williams, Kentucky National Guard. On this occasion we viewed all of the camp site and a portion of the maneuver grounds. Gen. Williams expressed his astonishment at what he saw, and stated that he could not understand upon what basis the Lexington papers had made their attacks upon this site, which was in every way most satisfactory for the purpose.

Gen. Roger D. Williams is a citizen of Lexington, Ky. He is one of our State's best citizens and most splendid soldiers. This general of the United States Army, making this report, says that Gen. Williams himself expressed surprise at the reports in the Lexington papers, which actuated my good friend, the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], in offering the resolution. Gen. Hunter concludes his report in this way:

I have seen some of the most remarkable statements against this camp site and I wish to state that they have no foundation in fact. If there are any mosquitoes, or have any sickness in this camp, it will be due to the fault of the occupants and not to the location of the site which should be as healthy as any to be found in the United States.

That is the report of the Army officer. I do not believe the American people are quite ready yet to discount the reports of our generals in command of our soldiers, simply because some aspiring city sent some unofficial individual down who made a report that he thinks is unfavorable to the Louisville site.

In addition to that, I have here a letter written to the Louisville Post by Andrew Cowan. Mr. Cowan was formerly chief of artillery in the Sixth Corps of the Army of the Potomac. He is one of Kentucky's greatest Federal soldiers, and one of her most distinguished Republican citizens. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read the letter, but I shall ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD. It shows that he had investigated the site most thoroughly, and that it is a healthful site, in fact, as fine a site as could be desired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Kentucky to have the letter printed in the RECORD is complied with.

The letter referred to is as follows:

ARMY CAMP SITE A SPLENDID ONE, SAYS COL. COWAN.

Col. Andrew Cowan, veteran of the Sixth Corps of the Army of the Potomac, has made an inspection of the cantonment and maneuver ground sites and has found them admirable.

Col. Cowan's judgment on the camp site will be accepted as conclusive by Louisville people, who know how thoroughly he is qualified to pass on it.

He invites the Lexington Board of Trade and the disgruntled editor to make an examination of the site.

Col. Cowan's opinion on the site is set forth in the following letter:

"EDITOR EVENING POST:

"DEAR SIR: I was unable to visit the cantonment site until yesterday. There had been a deluge of rain the evening before, and I expected to see it under water, as I had been impressed by the Lexington criticisms.

"I was surprised to find that the entire site for the encampment of the troops is high and dry, several hundred feet above the city at Main Street, gently rolling land, with excellent surface drainage. There was not a puddle to be seen on the entire thousand acres.

"No finer site for a great encampment could be found anywhere. There are no swampy or unwholesome places upon it or near it. It is bounded on the north by Audubon Country Clubhouse and its beautiful golf field; on the west by the well-paved, broad Preston Street Road and the Interurban Traction Line, now being double-tracked; on the south by 'Durretts Lane,' which is a smooth, paved road, wide enough for two big motor trucks, and extending eastward to the Poplar Level and the Newburg Turnpikes. The eastern boundary is about half way between the Poplar Level and the Newburg Road.

"So much for the encampment site, which will have an ample supply of wholesome, filtered water, and with sewers connecting with the city sewer system. The camp will be lighted with electricity. Very attractive and comfortable barrack buildings are being built with amazing speed. There will not be a more sanitary nor a more convenient cantonment in all the land.

"Now, for the maneuvering field and drill grounds, which cover about 1,300 acres, bounded on the east by the Preston Street Road, and extending a couple of miles, west and south, to the Louisville & Nashville road and Douglas Park. Here lies a level tract, admirably suited for drilling and maneuvering large bodies of Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery. Twenty regiments may be drilled there without crowding. It affords excellent opportunity for teaching trench and fortification work.

"Invite the Lexington Board of Trade and the Lexington Herald to send a committee of intelligent men to examine the site and there will be an end to such criticism as tends to discourage the friends of our soldiers who will be encamped here. We want all to know in advance that this camp site is beautiful, sanitary, and fit in every way.

"Yours, truly,

"ANDREW COWAN,
"Formerly Chief of Artillery,
"Sixth Corps, Army of the Potomac.

"LOUISVILLE, KY., June 30, 1917."

Mr. JAMES. I have telegrams from sundry citizens of Kentucky. Gen. John B. Castleman, for many years the head of the Kentucky State Guard, a distinguished Confederate soldier, and leading citizen of our State, sends me a telegram, as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 2, 1917.

Senator JAMES, Washington, D. C.:

By a conference of most representative citizens I am delighted to wire to you and ask that you will bring before the attention of the Senate the facts concerning the military camp selected near Louisville. Having more than 50 years' experience with troops in the field I have not known personally any camp site so suitable in all respects, so advantageous in topography, and so desirable from a sanitary point of view. Added to most unusual natural advantages, the site is penetrated by admirable city sewerage, city water, and city lighting; also electric and steam railway service. Our fellow citizens are led to ask that your colleagues in the Senate be advised of the foregoing, because our distinguished neighbor, Senator NEW, has unintentionally done a most serious injustice to the State of Kentucky and to the very competent and conservative representatives of the War Department.

JOHN B. CASTLEMAN.

I have a telegram from Gen. W. B. Haldeman, one of the editors of the Courier Journal and of the Louisville Times, and national committeeman and distinguished citizen, in which he says:

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 2, 1917.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The site selected for the cantonment at Louisville is in every way suitable and admirably adapted for the uses to which it will be put. The statements in a Lexington newspaper as to Congressman SHERLEY and as to the cantonment at Louisville are absolutely without foundation in fact.

W. B. HALDEMAN.

I have another telegram from Attilla Cox, jr., one of the leading business men of Louisville, which is as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 2, 1917.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
Washington, D. C.:

In addition to what others have said, desire to add my assurance based upon examination of the property that the Louisville cantonment site by reason of topography, sanitation, transportation, and other facilities could not be surpassed anywhere.

ATTILLA COX, Jr.

I have a telegram from Hon. Alexander P. Humphreys, one of the most distinguished lawyers of the State of Kentucky and the South, in which he says:

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 1, 1917.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
Washington, D. C.:

Just back from a drive to the camp site. You need have no fear of the fullest investigation as to its absolute fitness. All you need is to ask objectors to come and see it.

ALEX. P. HUMPHREYS.

I have also a telegram from Mr. R. V. Board, president of the Louisville Wagon Co., which reads:

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 1, 1917.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
Washington, D. C.:

Have had many years as manufacturer of munitions. Am well acquainted with Army encampment of Louisville, and the opinion of a number of Army officers as well as my own is that the site is healthful, convenient, and peculiarly adapted for purpose. Our Representatives in Congress and Senate, as well as the War Department, are to be congratulated.

R. V. BOARD,
President Louisville Wagon Co.

Mr. President, I merely desire to place these telegrams in the RECORD to show that the site is a splendid one, whatever may have been the rivalries and contentions between Kentucky and our good friends in Indiana, who have already had given to them the officers' training camp, with thousands of soldiers located there, known as Fort Benjamin Harrison. The War Department, after considering all the facts, decided that Indiana ought not to have two and Kentucky none and gave one to Kentucky and one to Indiana. I think all the facts disclose clearly and conclusively that the War Department acted wisely in selecting Louisville.

Personally I took no part as between the contending cities within my State. I was anxious to have the cantonment located in Kentucky, as I know my friend, Senator NEW, was anxious to have it located in Indiana; but after the issue has been decided we Kentuckians never fight over lost battles. We accept the decision as good, patriotic Americans. The report of the Secretary of War is overwhelming and conclusive, speaks for itself, and needs neither apology nor defense at my hands.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN obtained the floor.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, just a word further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana, if he desires to make a further explanation.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, just a word to say that I did not at any time seek to have the Secretary of War consider the claims of Indiana sites ahead of any of those in Kentucky. I made no personal effort, and did not seek in any way to exert any influence, personally or otherwise, with the Secretary of War or with any officer having anything to do with the selection of that site. I have never understood, and I have never intimated, that either my friend the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] or the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] had anything to do with securing the location of the site at Louisville.

Mr. President, so far as telegrams are concerned, I should like to say that there have been sent to me a great many telegrams from the State of Kentucky, and a good many exhibits, some of them physical, indicating that Louisville should not have been selected. I have not thought it best to introduce them on the floor of the Senate, and as I have said before, Mr. President, I think, under the circumstances, all has been said that it is necessary to say here concerning this matter.

The Secretary of War, in transmitting this report, says that he assumes responsibility for the selection of the Louisville site. I think that is proper, and I, Mr. President, am abundantly willing that the responsibility for it shall rest there. If the reports of the engineers, on which I based my original statement are correct, and if the objections which they make are well founded, that fact will be demonstrated in the course of time, and to time the whole matter must be left for final judgment.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m., Thursday, July 12, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, July 13, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate July 12, 1917.

CHIEF JUSTICE COURT OF APPEALS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Constantine J. Smyth to be chief justice of the Court of Appeals, District of Columbia.

DISTRICT JUDGE.

Frederick M. Brown to be United States district judge, district of Alaska, division No. 3.

MEMBER OF THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL OF PORTO RICO.

Luis Sanchez Morales to be a member of the Executive Council of Porto Rico.

REJECTION.

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate July 12, 1917.

W. E. Thomas to be United States district judge for the southern district of Georgia.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 13, 1917.

(Legislative day of Thursday, July 12, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 4960. An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

COL. L. MERVIN MAUS.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1766) to authorize the President to appoint Col. L. Mervin Maus to the grade of brigadier general in the United States Army and place him on the retired list, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 82) thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5405) making appropriations for certain session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Hollis	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smoot

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is necessarily absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is necessarily detained from the Senate this morning by reason of an accident, a misfortune beyond his control. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily detained by official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] was called home yesterday by illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand until his return.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are necessarily absent on important business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have received from Prof. F. S. Cooley, a professor of the Montana State College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts and director of the extension service of Montana, a letter, which reads as follows:

The holding up of the national food bills is causing serious embarrassment to the extension work in Montana and is almost rendering impossible the desired increase in food production and food conservation that was the object of these measures, because of the weeks' and months' delay in acting.

The agricultural season is so far advanced that a large part of the effectiveness of these measures is already lost. Can not something be done to speed these food bills to early action?

I read that letter not so much with the hope of securing action on the pending measure before the 21st day of this month, the day fixed by the unanimous-consent agreement for final action on it, as to show the feeling of the farmers of Montana in regard to the bill and to show that those who represent the agricultural interests of Montana are heartily in favor of the enactment of the measure, and of its speedy enactment without further delay. I would be glad if the bill could be enacted before the 21st day of this month, because, as Prof. Cooley says, the agricultural interests and the educational extension work of Montana are suffering very much on account of the delay in the enactment of the legislation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. GORE. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. MYERS. I am going to take about 5 or 10 minutes in making some comments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that the feature which takes care of agricultural extension work is in the bill which has already been passed.

Mr. MYERS. But it has not yet become a law. Prof. Cooley complains of that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is not the fault of the Senate. We passed the bill two days after it reached us from the House, but the House did not give us a conference for nearly three weeks, and then in the conference they objected to two splendid provisions. They have not agreed to the provisions of the bill, one of which would put a stop to improper conduct by middlemen, and the other of which would give the President the right to control grain exchanges.

Mr. MYERS. Prof. Cooley does not blame the Senate for delay on that measure; he blames Congress, and of course the House is a part of Congress; but I am laying his complaint before the Senate, and I think there is much merit in his complaint. I feel it to be my duty to put it before the Senate, because Prof. Cooley stands very high in educational and agricultural circles in Montana, and I know he is well fitted and qualified to speak for the agricultural interests of Montana.

I certainly deplore, as much as does the Senator from Georgia or anybody else, the delay in the report of the conference committee on the other food bill, which has passed the Senate and which needs to be enacted into law quite as much as the bill pending before us. I indorse the statement of Prof. Cooley that the farmers and the people of Montana are very much in need of the enactment of both food measures.

As to the measure now before the Senate, I am very heartily in favor of it and feel sure that the people of Montana are in favor of it. Doubtless it ought to be amended in some respects, and I intend myself to vote for some amendments. I believe that the Government ought to be intrusted with power to fix both minimum and maximum prices on foods and other necessities of life.

I have heard a great deal said against the pending bill during the several weeks in which it has been debated by the Senate on account of what are called its drastic features, and there are drastic features in it, undoubtedly; but we are living in drastic times and under drastic conditions, the most drastic which this country has every known, the most drastic which the world has ever known; and we will need much drastic legislation, in my opinion, before we prevail in this war and overcome the central powers, with whom we are now at war, in conjunction with the entente allies. The people will expect it of us.

A few days ago I clipped from a newspaper an article about the condition of the army of one of the nations now at war with Germany and the other central powers in Europe. I will read it, because it made a deep and sad impression upon me and is of concern to us. It tells a forlorn tale. It is as follows:

The condition of the Serbian Army, after nearly three years of the bitterest experience undergone by any of the entente allied forces, is described by Herbert Corey, the war correspondent, in a graphic communication to the National Geographic Society, a part of which is issued as the following war geography bulletin from the society's Washington headquarters:

"The Serbs are the poor relations of the allies. They are armed with the old St. Etienne rifles which the French discarded. The artillery in support has been cast from other fronts. Their surgeons are borrowed surgeons, for the most part. They are uniformed and fed by the French, and Great Britain loans them money. They never have enough cars, even for staff use. Sometimes they have not enough food. But they always have enough ammunition and they find enough fighting for themselves.

"The Serbian Army began the great retreat of 1915, 250,000 strong. Not more than 150,000 reached asylum on the island of Corfu after the winter's fight through the snow-filled passes of Albania and Montenegro. In the confusion of those days some one had forgotten. There was not sufficient food or clothing or medicines or nursing awaiting them. Men who had struggled through the winter died on the open beaches of the Island of Vido.

"Dying men dug their own graves and then dug the graves of the men already dead. Not more than half were fit to serve again when the fall campaign of 1916 began.

"It was a sad army—bitter army—but not a despairing army that I accompanied last winter. Many of these men were 'cheechas,' in the Serb phrase. When a man reaches the age of 40 he becomes 'uncle' to his neighbors. Some of these men were in the fourth line before the war.

"Serbia to the Serb peasant means the little white cottage, the plum orchard, the 10 acres of ground. Few of them had been 50 miles away from home when war began five years ago in the Balkans. Fewer have seen their homes since. They have received no news from their wives and families, for the Austro-Bulgarian censorship had been extremely severe. They have seen their comrades die. Most of them—three men out of five in some units—have been wounded at some time during the war.

"There were no songs upon the march except during those vivid days when the Bulgarians were being forced out of Monastir. There was no light-hearted talk about the campfires. There was no music except that now and then one heard the weird and complaining tones of a one-stringed fiddle which some patient soldier had made out of the material at hand. They kept to themselves or in little groups of twos and threes. At night scores of tiny fires would sparkle in the open land on either side of the Monastir road, where the paired comrades were cooking their evening meal. They marched badly, slowly, slouching, their old shoulders bowed under their packs, their grizzled faces deeply lined. Yet these men were the cutting edge of the weapon that bent back the Bulgarian lines.

"One division—the Morava—remained in the aggressive for 95 days without rest. During that period they had but one trench—the front trench. They had no second line, no reserve, no rest camp.

"One regiment of the Choumadia division lost 1,000 out of 1,400 men in taking Vetternik Mountain, and then held that mountain under fire from the Rock of Blood, which dominated the summit, for 20 days until relief came. Even then the men of the regiment which had been so nearly wiped out did not go to rest. They stayed on Vetternik.

"In the taking of Kaymakchalan half of some of the organizations were killed outright.

"The Serbs were enabled to do these things partly because of the experience gained in five years of almost continuous fighting. Another factor was the spirit of the men. They no longer hoped for anything for themselves. They expected to die. Those who still remain expect to be killed in action. But they intend that the bill of Serbia shall be paid."

That is one of the saddest chapters which has been written during the present terrible world war. In my opinion, it is one of the saddest annals of warfare in the history of all the world, from the beginning of time. Those men are virtually our allies; they are fighting our battles; they are fighting to help us win a common cause against common enemies. I believe we could justifiably enact much drastic legislation in order to help them and to help that common cause, which is of just as great interest to us as it is to the poor, miserable creatures who are described in the article which I have read; to enable us to prevail in this war and, at the same time, not only help ourselves and our cause but help these miserable creatures who are helping to fight our battles.

There is drastic legislation in this bill, but, as I have said, the times demand drastic legislation. I think this Government will have to do many drastic things before it overcomes Germany and her allies. In my opinion, Germany is not going to be easily vanquished in this war. She is not yet nearly to the vanquished point and, in my opinion, she will not be for a good while to come. I look for this war to last for two or three years yet, unless in the meantime there should be a revolution in Germany, of which there may be some chance. It may last even longer than that. I believe that we should set our house in order now for a long and desperate conflict. If, happily, the conflict should end sooner than we now expect, we shall be so much the better for it. I believe that we need not only drastic legislation along the lines of this bill, but I think the Government should take drastic action in a number of other respects, in order to properly fortify ourselves for the gigantic contest upon which we are but just entering, the length of which no man can foretell. We know not how long it may last. We only know it will be a desperate and gigantic struggle, which will require our utmost efforts, for it is no small undertaking upon which we have embarked.

From newspaper and other reports our country seems to be filled with spies, and our enemies in Europe appear to be getting accurate information on many important things which we are doing. I do not know where the blame for that may lie, or if there is any blame, or if it is simply incidental to a country entering upon a newly declared war of unprecedented proportions, but I think there should be drastic action to prevent a continuation of that dangerous state of affairs.

The labor conditions of our country in the West is very deplorable. I read in the newspapers that I. W. W.'s are openly threatening to burn all of the ripened grain in the Dakotas; threatening to burn all of the grain stacks, after the grain may be harvested and stacked in North Dakota.

The newspapers report that northern Idaho is terrorized by lawless elements which have injected themselves into the labor situation in that part of the country, to the detriment of necessary industry, suspending all logging operations. Every sawmill in the Northwest is closed down, completely paralyzing the lumber industry, and the mines and smelters of two great mining States of the West are threatened with being closed down in the near future unless a change takes place in the labor situation. I do not charge all of these strikes and all of these labor troubles to lawless elements—I am sure many engaged in them have no unlawful object or intention—but I do believe that much of the trouble was incited by lawless elements, controlled by people who are hostile to the welfare of this country in the prosecution of the war in which we are engaged, with a view to crippling our productivity and our facilities for successfully waging the war. Indeed, some agitators in different parts of the country are appealing to honest workingmen to do nothing to aid their country in the prosecution of the war, and are so disloyal as to denounce the part we are taking in the war.

There are many things to-day, at the opening of our participation in the war which require drastic action at the hands of the Government, action which would not be considered for a moment if we were in times of profound and blissful peace, and which would not then be necessary. In order to get in shape for the successful prosecution of this war, we must do many things which we would not do in times of peace. I believe many things are now justifiable on our part which would not be justifiable in times of peace. I believe the food-control bill which is before us is one of them, and I reecho the sentiment of Prof. Cooley, of Montana, who, in turn, I believe voices the sentiment of the farmers and the agricultural masses of Montana, in asking for the speedy enactment of this measure. The high cost of living in this country has become scandalous and outrageous. The food speculator has grown rich, and the people suffer. The cost of comfortable living is already beyond the reach of thousands of working people and is causing strikes and unrest. We must have relief. The people demand it of us.

Before closing, I will pause to say that I have heard very much said about certain features of this bill being unconstitutional. I have heard more reference to drastic measures and to unconstitutional legislation during the debate on this bill than I have ever heard, I believe, in all my experience in the United States Senate. As I have said, I think the drastic features of the bill in large part are justifiable, and as to the argument that many features of the bill are unconstitutional, I have the honor on that score to agree with the expressions of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who a few weeks ago said in the Senate that Congress, being endowed by the Constitution with the power to declare war, is endowed with the power to do anything which may be necessary to the successful prosecution of that war. I believe that is sound doctrine and is necessary to our self-preservation as a Nation. I agree with the further statement made by the able Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on this floor some weeks ago, that this country in time of war has the right to do anything which is necessary to preserve it from destruction. I believe that, before the war is at an end, we will find it necessary to do many things which have not yet been contemplated; and I think that one of the first things to be done now is the enactment of the measure which is now pending before the Senate. The people need it and want it. They are impatient of delay. The talk of drastic features does not frighten them. Drastic conditions need drastic remedies. I hope to see its speedy enactment.

Mr. CALDER obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. GORE. If to be drastic in its character be a recommendation for any legislation, the pending bill has a certificate of good character. It must be drastic enough for the most drastic. It leaves nothing to be longed for. But it seems to me that the paramount question is not is the proposed measure drastic, but is it wise? Is it beneficent? Will it answer our hopes? Will it accomplish the end which we all have at heart?

If the best of intentions were a guaranty against evil consequences, then we need have no hesitation in passing this or passing any other proposed legislation. We are all inspired by the best possible intentions. Our intentions are, I believe, beyond challenge, but unfortunately mere holy intentions will not protect us against evil consequences unless we act with wisdom and act in the light of human experience. It seems to be the fate of drastic legislation that it generally defeats the very ends which it seeks to accomplish.

I shall not answer the Senator's argument touching the Constitution. There are those who agree with him that the Constitution collapses or takes flight or is in nubibus pending war. I did listen with some interest to the suggestion of the Senator that this Government had a right to do anything that was necessary to win this war. Why, Mr. President, we are now waging war against the doctrine of State necessity. Germany insisted that it was necessary in order to preserve her existence to sink neutral passenger ships without notice. Does the Senator mean to say that the United States Government would be justified in sinking passenger ships without notice? That is included in his argument.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will answer the question, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. I had reference to our own internal affairs, those which we have a right to govern. I did not mean that we had a right to do what Germany has done, assail the rights of wholly neutral nations. That is in no wise involved.

Mr. GORE. Then the Senator thinks the principles of international law are more binding than the principles of the Constitution?

Mr. MYERS. Not at all.

Mr. GORE. When you once adopt the doctrine of State necessity, and that necessity justifies the means, there is then no limit.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to have the Senator reply to a question which I will ask. Would the Senator rather this country would be defeated in the war and made a province of Germany than to exercise any power which this Government is able to exercise in regard to its own affairs?

Mr. GORE. Certainly not. I am willing to do everything that can be done within the limits of the Constitution, which we are sworn to support, within the principles of international law and within the principles of humanity to carry American arms to speedy triumph.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator another question, inasmuch as the Senator has brought me into the argument. I based my statement on the power granted by the Constitution; but I want to go a little further, and ask the Senator what good it would do us to have a Constitution but no Government—if we were destroyed and had nothing but the Constitution left?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that is a fault, if a fact, which the Senator must find with the makers of the Constitution and with the Constitution itself, and not with me. If our fathers placed limitations on legislation in the Constitution, neither the Senator nor myself is responsible.

They placed no real limitation on the power to wage war to success. It is these new-fangled, these fanciful, these alleged powers which contravene the Constitution, which contravene all the lessons of experience, which contravene the laws of economics, and which contravene alike the laws of nature and of human nature, which I call in question.

The authorities hold that there is no limitation upon the power of Congress in raising armies, but there is a limitation upon the means of supporting armies. The limitation is expressly set out in the Constitution itself.

Certain of these limitations are expressly set out in the Bill of Rights. They do not shackle the Government; they only shield the citizen. With the power to conscript, the power to tax, and the power to commandeer, there is no sovereign power lacking to complete national defense.

Where the Senator and I differ is in this: That it is not necessary to disregard all human experience; it is not necessary to attempt impossibilities in order to observe the Constitution or to carry our arms to victory.

Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of interest to the letter from President Cooley of the Agricultural College of Montana. I appreciate the force of what he says. However much he may have referred to the pending bill, his arguments were addressed to the bill which passed the Senate on June 1. The Senate passed that bill two days after it came from the House, and the Senate is subject to no criticism in that regard. We acted with great haste. We were told that its passage was urgent on the part of the Department of Agriculture. That determined our report, and the measure was speedily passed. I think possibly the House is—perhaps I ought not to say what I had in mind, but I will say that the conferees ought to have been appointed earlier than the 28th or 29th of June.

Now, it is possible that the Senate conferees may be in some fault for not receding from the Senate amendments. It may be possible, or at least Senators may think so, that we are holding with too much tenacity and too much doggedness to the amendments which were attached to that bill by the Senate, but we have not felt so, and I take it the House conferees are equally as sincere as ourselves.

I had printed in the RECORD the other day a letter from the dean of the Agricultural College of the State of New York, urging that the food-production bill should be speedily enacted into law. That bill does carry an appropriation of nearly $4,500,000 to carry on extension and demonstration work. The season is far advanced; the seeding time is over; and the State colleges are anxious to perfect their organizations and to cooperate with the Department of Agriculture. They are now standing on tiptoe; they are uncertain what to do. It is unfortunate, Mr. President, but, as I have said, certainly the Senate is not at fault, and I hesitate to believe that the Senate conferees can as yet be regarded as being defaulters of their duty. I send to the desk a telegram——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question at this point?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. There is a difference between the House and the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Is it not a fact that that difference consists in this, that the Senate conferees have insisted that the amendment punishing or preventing gambling operations on the boards of trade and the other amendment prohibiting the hoarding of foodstuffs shall remain in the bill? Is not that the contention of the Senate?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, of course, I may not be at liberty to divulge what transpired in the conference, but the Senate conferees are insisting on the retention of those two amendments.

Mr. REED. That is all I wanted to ask.

Mr. GORE. I ask to have read a telegram which I received from the president of the National Farmers Union. I think this telegram was written with perhaps too much enthusiasm.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., July 12, 1917.

Hon. T. P. GORE,
Chairman Senate Agricultural Committee,
Washington, D. C.:

Farmers are to be congratulated over the prospects of your substitute being adopted. Morning papers report that some one endeavoring to have provision for power to suspend grain or similar exchanges. Under no circumstances should this power be given. Farmers do not want cotton exchanges closed again; we had a dose of this in 1914. Papers also report New York and New England interests are urging that Lord Northcliffe's plan be favored. We desire this plan opposed in toto. National cotton-futures law enacted August, 1916, provides all needed safeguards, and we want no more changes which will again give advantage over cotton farmers to the spinners of the world. Lord Northcliffe's plan and cotton in food-control bill would place the cotton farmers at the mercy of manipulators and spinners.

I. N. MCCOLLISTER,
Chairman Marketing and Traffic Committee Association,
State Farmers' Union Presidents.

Mr. GORE. Now, Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order at this time to move a substitute for the pending bill—I mean, after the enacting clause?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a pending committee amendment and an agreement to take up the committee amendments first, so that until they are disposed of at least the motion to strike out and substitute will not be in order.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the pending bill and the substitute presented by the Senator from Oklahoma both declare it to be unlawful for any person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the Government in any capacity, including an advisory capacity to any commission, board, or council of the Government, to procure, attempt to procure, or make any contract for the purchase of any supplies for the use of the Government, either from himself, from any firm of which he is a member, or corporation of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in which he has any financial interest.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. KNOX. May I inquire whether the provisions of both bills are exactly the same?

Mr. CALDER. Exactly the same.

Mr. President, I have carefully read both of these provisions, which, as I say, are exactly the same in both bills, and have felt that perhaps they might have been aimed at the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense. I realize that much is to be said in favor of this amendment. It would seem wholly improper for any man acting as an agent or in an advisory capacity with the Government to sell to the Government goods the purchase of which, in his capacity as an advisory agent, he had recommended. I am totally opposed to the continuance of a policy which would permit that sort of thing to exist; but I am certain, Mr. President, that there are to-day many men acting as voluntary agents or in some advisory capacity with the Government who are prompted by just as patriotic motives as anybody else in the country.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. If I understood the Senator correctly, his statement was that the pending bill and the substitute offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] are the same.

Mr. CALDER. Yes; in so far as they deal in the matter I am discussing.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator has overlooked the proviso on page 18 of the Gore bill, which provides:

That this section shall not be construed to prevent any such agent or employee of the Government, or any person acting in an advisory capacity, from rendering services and advice on any matter not connected with such purchase of supplies.

That is not in the original bill, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. It is not in the original bill?

Mr. GRONNA. No. There is a vast difference between the two.

Mr. CALDER. I did not notice the proviso to which the Senator has referred. I am glad to have the Senator call my attention to it, because it covers the matter to a certain extent.

Mr. President, there has been much comment here and in other places on the men who are doing the very excellent work for the Government now being performed by the advisory commission and those associated with them. I have in my hand a list containing the names of these gentlemen.

The first on this list is Mr. Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. I wonder if anybody here would suggest that Mr. Willard, when he is selling transportation to the Government, is doing anything or advising anything for his own interest as against that of the country?

The second on that list is Mr. Howard E. Coffin, the vice president of the Hudson Motor Co. I am informed that Mr. Coffin, immediately upon war being threatened, on his own account and associated with other gentlemen not connected with the Government, began a mobilization of all the great manufacturing interests of the country. I know of no man who has performed more patriotic service for the benefit of this Nation than has Mr. Coffin. Now, as I say, Mr. Coffin is connected with the Hudson Motor Co. It is possible that the Hudson Motor Co. may sell automobiles to the Government. It may compete with other automobile companies in doing such business. I deny most emphatically that Mr. Coffin would for a moment endeavor so to arrange the Nation's automobile purchases that his particular line might be preferred as against others.

The third on the list is Mr. Julius Rosenwald.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator leaves Mr. Coffin, will he permit an inquiry?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Hudson Motor Co. had 60,000 automobiles for private use contracted for in 1917, to be delivered in due season, from time to time. Mr. Coffin was on this board that restricted originally the agricultural-implement manufacturers from having more than 50 per cent of the sheet-steel supply required in the harvesting and corn-planter business of the West. At the same time that this was done by the board or commission on which Mr. Coffin was serving they placed no restriction whatever on automobiles, either for Government contracts or for private luxury or necessity.

While I do not question the ability or honesty of purpose of Mr. Coffin or any of the gentlemen associated with him, I respectfully suggest that sometimes they do not see the full effect of the orders or the arrangements they make in their activity.

Mr. CALDER. This information is new to me. I am very glad to have it, and very glad to have it in the RECORD; but the point I wish to make is that in competition with other automobile concerns of the country I am certain, from my knowledge of Mr. Coffin's character, that he would do nothing with an unpatriotic purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think it would be a very much higher class of patriotism if it were unaccompanied with any expectant profits; and would it not be wiser to have a law specifically prohibiting these gentlemen from selling to the Government while acting in this governmental capacity? Such a law applies to Senators. Why should it not apply to these officers of the Government?

Mr. CALDER. I do not understand that any of the gentlemen on the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense are interested, directly or indirectly, in advocating the purchase of their particular product at the hands of the Government. Now, if we enact the provision contained in the pending measure, then we prevent the Government from obtaining the advice or counsel of its leading business men, because nearly every one of the leading business men of this Nation, nearly every one of the great leaders of industry, is interested, directly or indirectly, in some concern that may be in some manner doing business with the Government.

I will say to the Senator that I am going to make a confession myself. I discovered the other day that the Brooklyn Navy Yard and the fort known as Fort Hamilton purchase gas from a Brooklyn gas concern at a price fixed by law. A member of my family happens to own a few shares of stock in this gas company. Now, to say that because of this fact I can not be trusted to pass upon measures affecting the Government of the United States is, to say the least, very absurd; and so to suggest that these gentlemen, leaders of industry in the United States, are not to be trusted to advise upon these great governmental problems is, in my judgment, going very far afield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield again, nothing is further from my thought than to prohibit these gentlemen from advising the Government.

Mr. CALDER. They are prohibited by this section from doing so if they have any financial interest in the supplies concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. But what I do object to is their advising the Government as to the price of the articles that they themselves sell to the Government. If they want to be patriotic, they had better let somebody else sell to the Government while they are acting as the Government's agents.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will my colleague permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Acting upon that theory, would the Senator from Tennessee advocate that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad shall not transport any troops or supplies for the Government because Mr. Willard happens to be on the advisory commission?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it would be very much better for the Government itself to fix the price at which troops are transported.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that the Government does do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does fix the price. That would be wholly immaterial, because the price is fixed already by the Government and by a different department of the Government, so that the principle which the Senator suggests would not be applicable in this particular case. The price-fixing is not done by the railroad.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I trespass upon the good nature of my colleague once more?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply wish to suggest that the rate fixed by the Government to the railways for the transportation of troops or Government supplies is not the only element in the equation. It is entirely probable that on many occasions it will be necessary to increase the amount of Government transportation upon a certain railroad over and above what is carried by some other railroad. It may be necessary in the Government interest, we will say, that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad should transport on a moment's notice a great mass of supplies or many thousands of troops. For the particular purpose desired at that moment the facilities of that road may be the best for the Government, but under this proposal, as I read it, it can not be done if Mr. Willard advises it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say that if that was the case, and it was best for the Government to use the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad to the exclusion of other railroads that wanted the business or had a right to the business, the president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad would put himself in a very improper attitude before the public if he used his place on the Council of National Defense to obtain that business for his road. The President of the United States never gave out a better statement or a stronger statement than when he said yesterday that profits and patriotism ought not to go together in dealings with the Government; and I want to commend that statement in the highest terms. I do not believe this war should be conducted on any such principle as profits going to those who are in places of high trust, or to those who may be interested along that line.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee and I have no disagreement on that point. I should be the first one to denounce a man who would directly or indirectly seek to profit by his connection with a commission of this character.

The Senator refers to the patriotic address of the President, and I commend, too, his address of yesterday; but does the Senator know that these men who are being criticized here were appointed on this commission by the President or with his approval? Does he know that associated with Mr. Willard are Mr. Harrison, president of the Southern Railway; Mr. Rea, of the Pennsylvania; and the presidents of other important railways of the Nation? Does the Senator mean to intimate that these distinguished men, these great leaders of industry in this Nation, are using their places for profit? Can it be maintained that there are no patriots in this country who have any business standing? Or are the patriots only to be found among those who have no business standing, and who are incompetent to advise the Government on these matters of grave concern?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean to imply no such thing as the Senator suggests; quite the contrary. I take it that these men are high-minded men and are seeking to do their patriotic duty. If they are doing that, they need not be afraid a particle on account of the provision known as section 3 of this bill. I take it that they are living up to that, and I take it that they are not seeking any advantage; and, for the life of me, I can not understand how there can be any opposition to section 3, unless some one is seeking profits along with patriotism. If they are not—and I assume from what the Senator says and from what other people say and from the general situation that they are not—of course, if they are not, they have nothing to fear from section 3. It is only when profits come from their patriotic action that they have anything to fear from section 3.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. KENYON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CALDER. I yield first to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. In addition to the statement and the question of the Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Willard will be regulated, if the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. deal with the Government, by the Interstate Commerce Commission and all the publicity that for many years has attended its operation. There is no such mechanism to control the sale of private merchandise. I wish to ask the Senator from New York whether they are not patriotic and honorable men on this commission. No one questions that. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not think there are patriotic and honorable men serving in the House and the Senate. Still if we do what the board of public defense and its subcommittees are doing we would be impeached and indicted and removed from the House and Senate and sent to the penitentiary, as we ought to be. We can not practice law any more. Public opinion has put an end to that in the absence of a statute. We can not any longer appear before Federal courts for a corporation that used to be a client before we came here. Public opinion put an end to that, and justly so. I would be as willing to vote for a measure that would be prohibitory upon a Senator from practicing in courts in behalf of clients who would benefit by legislation under this bill as I am to vote to prevent them from contracting for the sale of merchandise in which they are financially interested. It is not a question of patriotism; it is a question of removing them from temptation and from the wrong construction put upon their action.

Mr. CALDER. I will now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. It seems to me that the Senator from New York does not have a correct construction of this section. The Senator believes that men like Mr. Willard would be prevented from serving on the Council of National Defense, I take it, from his remarks?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator is wrong about that. Will the Senator point out under this section just the language which would debar Mr. Willard from occupying this position? If not, I will answer my own question.

Mr. CALDER. It reads:

That it is hereby declared unlawful for any person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the Government in any capacity, including an advisory capacity to any commission, board, or council of the Government, to procure, attempt to procure, or make any contract for the purchase of any supplies for the use of the Government either from himself, from any firm of which he is a member, or corporation of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in which he has any financial interest.

It would seem to me, Mr. President, that if a man acting upon one of the advisory boards or one of its subcommittees is a stockholder of a corporation doing business with the Government, whether he may advise the business or not, he is acting in violation of this provision.

Mr. KENYON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. If he is not, then I am very much mistaken in my reading of the language, and I have nothing more to say about it.

Mr. KENYON. I think there is a misconception about this section. I am sure there has been no desire on the part of the committee to debar these business men from their very necessary work in helping the Government.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to this. The party he speaks of would not be permitted to make a contract for the purchase of supplies, to procure a contract or to attempt to procure it. He is barred from doing that.

Mr. CALDER. He ought not to be permitted to do it.

Mr. KENYON. That is all this section does. In order to be certain about the matter, a proviso is inserted which would give him a right to advise about matters and about the purchase of supplies with which he was not connected. How in the world anybody can object to that proposition I can not understand. Mr. Willard would not be barred under this section from doing exactly what he is doing now, but he would be barred from making contracts with the Government for the purchase of supplies from concerns in which he is interested, and that is all there is in the section.

Mr. CALDER. Now, while the Senator is on his feet, let me cite the third name, that of Mr. Rosenwald, president of Sears, Roebuck & Co., of Chicago.

Mr. KENYON. The gentleman who has been speaking of Congress in the highest complimentary terms, from his standpoint.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator takes up Mr. Rosenwald, because the section in controversy has just been read, will the Senator allow me at that point to put in the present statute of the United States?

Mr. CALDER. I want to finish just a short statement, and then I will be glad to yield. Mr. Rosenwald is a manufacturer and a great merchant in this country. I wish to propound to the Senator from Iowa if some company in which Mr. Rosenwald may be a shareholder should without his knowledge and without his attempting to secure the business for them sell some goods to the Government, would he be violating the provisions of this section?

Mr. KENYON. He would not, unless he made the contract or if he attempted to procure the contract, and there might be a good deal of latitude as to what an attempt to procure a contract might be. If he did procure the contract himself, he would be liable under this section.

Mr. CALDER. Or if he advises with the Government as to the sort of material the Government should have along certain lines, and then in competition his concern obtains the contract he would be liable.

Mr. KENYON. If that advice went to the extent of being an attempt to procure the contract he would be liable, but if he only gave advice without any attempt to procure the contract I do not think he would. That is a matter for construction by the court.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Missouri wishes me to yield to him, and I do so.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in connection with the proposed section which has just been read I desire to call attention to section 41 of the Public Laws, volume 35, as it appears on page 1097. I call the attention of the Senator to this section and ask him to tell me why it is not just as broad as the proposed section? The section reads:

SEC. 41. No officer or agent of any corporation, joint stock company, or association, and no member or agent of any firm or person directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of such corporation, joint stock company, association, or firm, shall be employed or shall act as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation, joint stock company, association, or firm. Whoever shall violate the provisions of this section shall be fined not more than $2,000 and imprisoned not more than two years. (Vol. 35, Pt. I, Public Laws; U. S. Stat. L., 60th Cong., p. 1097.)

That section has been on the statute books in substance and effect since March 2, 1863. In the various revisions of the law it has undergone some slight changes, but they have not affected its material properties. It seems to me if the Senator wants to exclude from the purview of the law those who will be brought within the proposed amendment, then he must proceed also to repeal the law as it has stood now for more than 50 years.

Mr. CALDER. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have no desire or no intention of defending here or espousing the cause of any man who is using his place as a member of the advisory commission to sell his goods to the Government or to profit by his connection with any such commission. A man who at a critical period like this would even attempt to do anything of that character is, in my judgment, just short of being guilty of treason and should be treated accordingly. I have nothing but the greatest condemnation for a man who under the guise of being an adviser of the Government, a voluntary adviser of the Government, will profit by his position. So there is no difference of opinion between the Senator and myself on this point.

But I maintain, Mr. President, that we have built up this advisory commission and in many respects it has been a very great benefit to the Government. If Senators can point out where, in any single instance, members of this commission have profited by their membership in it, I shall join with them in condemning the men and in holding them up to the ridicule and condemnation of the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think there is not a great deal of difference between the Senator's views and those that I have on this subject. Our difference grows entirely out of a possible misunderstanding on the part of the Senator as to just what this language provides. I wish to call his attention to the words in lines 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and so forth. Here is what is prohibited:

That it is hereby declared unlawful for any person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the Government in any capacity, including an advisory capacity to any commission, board, or council of the Government, to procure, attempt to procure, or make any contract for the purchase of any supplies for the use of the Government either from himself, from any firm of which he is a member, or corporation of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in which he has any financial interest.

Now, take the case of Mr. Willard of whom the Senator has spoken, and surely we might well take Mr. Willard, because so far as I have known or heard Mr. Willard is a man of as high standing and integrity as any man in our country. So we will take him for the purpose of illustration. Let us suppose that Mr. Willard should use his position upon this advisory commission to procure or attempt to procure or to make a contract for the purchase of supplies for any company of which he is a member. Does the Senator think for a moment that that would be proper conduct on the part of Mr. Willard? I am using Mr. Willard simply as an illustration, because I feel sure that is the only way in which Mr. Willard could be used in such a matter. Does not the Senator think that he ought to be prohibited from using that position for any such purpose?

Mr. CALDER. Of course I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then that is all there is in it.

Mr. CALDER. I can conceive just how Mr. Willard might do what the Senator suggests. Suppose with his other associates on the railroad subcommittee, all of them presidents of the leading railroads, sitting in counsel and determining just how troops and freight should be routed, they should allot to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad certain business and to other railroads other business. Mr. Willard might be put in a position of determining just exactly what traffic should go to his road, and, although perhaps it may be a strained interpretation, he might be accused of violating the provisions of this section. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will join with me in making this section plain, I shall have no further complaint to make.

Mr. KENYON. I was just going to ask the Senator if he thought the transportation of troops would be the purchase of supplies in the language of the bill?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; it is purchase of transportation that I have in mind.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that transportation is a matter fixed by law. The Interstate Commerce Commission fixes it and has control over it. As a matter of fact, if certain railroads banded themselves together and undertook by reason of their place on this committee to monopolize the business of the Government I think the Senator will agree with me that they ought not to do that to the exclusion of roads that did not have representatives on the council. I am sure the Senator agrees to that proposition. That is all this would require.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, after all, these gentlemen acting in an advisory capacity with the Government do not sell their goods, do not advise the sale of their goods to the Government, and do not pass finally upon whether any goods that they may have to sell or anybody else may have to sell shall be purchased by the Government. I hold in my hand a copy of this morning's New York Sun and will read a statement made by Secretary Lane yesterday. If the Senate will bear with me, I am going to occupy the time for a moment just to call their attention to it:

WASHINGTON, July 11.

The relation of business men to the Government was described today by Franklin Lane, Secretary of the Interior and one of the six Cabinet members who compose the Council of National Defense. Answering talk in Congress and elsewhere suggesting that members of the council are in position to make contracts with themselves and thus derive personal profit from the war, Mr. Lane said the business men composing the advisory commission have no control over contracts, and, in fact, give to the Government infinitely more than they receive.

"We have nothing to sell," he said. "When it is considered that the Council of National Defense consists of Secretary Baker, a lawyer; Secretary Daniels, an editor; Secretary Lane, a lawyer; Secretary Houston, a college president; Secretary Redfield, a retired business man; Secretary Wilson, a labor-union official, you will realize that there is not much chance for that charge being true.

"No; nobody thinks that we are dealing with ourselves. The confusion has come about because of the peculiar organization of the council. Get into your head one of two facts and you will see how this confusion has arisen. The Council of National Defense buys nothing. That body was created by Congress as a measure of preparedness to mobilize resources—a sort of stock-taking body.

"If we came to war, what did we have in the way of resources to make war with? That was the idea. It is not a war council in the English sense, which can direct policies. The President is our war council. It is not a purchasing board, because there is not a man on it who can buy anything excepting the Secretaries of War and Navy, and the council can not direct them what to buy."

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. REED. When you except the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, of course you except two gentlemen who do buy directly or indirectly or supervise the purchase of all our war supplies to a point that is almost unlimited.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield further, Mr. Baker in his testimony before the House committee stated—and has stated personally, too—that the members of these various committees recommend the contract and the War Department enter into a contract as recommended by them. So there can not be any question about the proceedings.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from New York has been very good-natured in yielding. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if the advisory committee, on getting together with Secretary Lane, who gives out this interview, did not recommend the price of coal at a rate which Secretary Baker promptly repudiated?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly; and I think he was exactly right about it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CALDER. Just a minute. I yield first to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I was simply going to add as a part of my question that in the very proceeding it seems the advisory committee on coal, as I understand it, of which Mr. Peabody, a great coal dealer, was the chairman, in connection with Secretary Lane, recommended the prices which were so exorbitant to the American people to-day, but Secretary Baker, with a patriotism that is commendable, repudiated the whole transaction. I think Secretary Baker and Secretary Daniels have stood between these plunderers and the American people.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. Just a minute. Does the Senator from Iowa mean to infer that the members of the advisory board are plunderers?

Mr. KENYON. No; I do not. It may be that some of them are plunderers; I do not know; but the great majority of them are not. However, I refer to plunderers as the men who are trying to take advantage of this war-time situation to rob the American people, and they are doing it and will keep on until Congress stops it.

Mr. CALDER. In reply to the Senator I will say that I have the fullest sympathy with any move that he or anyone will make to stop plundering the American people by anybody.

Mr. REED and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. CALDER. I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on the question of coal I have just a word to say. I have had occasion to examine some prices of coal, and the remarkable thing is that on the very day that this committee, or whatever you may see fit to call it, fixed the price of coal at $3 a ton and obtained the O. K. of Secretary Lane and a most eulogistic speech from him—on that very day the open coal prices for open business in the mines of several important States was away below the price they fixed, and the agreed price was an actual increase.

Now I am going to put a question to the Senator from New York. I am not attacking anybody; but if a great coal man were at the head of that commission, and if he assembled a lot of other great coal men from the country, and they together had agreed upon a price for coal which the Secretary of War said was extortionate and wrong, and if in fact that price was a raise above the price then being obtained in the open market in several of the States, does the Senator think that that was not the reaping of an advantage by those gentlemen through their connection with the Government?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that if the facts are as stated, and they can be so ascertained, then the Council of National Defense ought to ask the members of the coal committee for their resignations from it, and, if they will not resign, ought to remove them.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Senators are discussing this matter of profits, and so forth, and I want to say a word, if I may, directly on the subject.

Mr. CALDER. For just a moment or two?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; for just a moment or two of time. Later on I expect to say something more at length on the subject.

I have a positive knowledge of one coal company that is making over 800 per cent on its investment in this present crisis. I desire to say, further, that if the Federal Trade Commission does not investigate the question of profits I shall later introduce a resolution in the Senate authorizing the Interstate Commerce Committee, or some other committee, to investigate it and compel these coal barons to bring their books, so that the public may know the extent to which it is being robbed.

I want, as indicating the advantage that some of these coal operators are taking of the present condition, to have a circular letter read bearing on that subject. The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and perhaps the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] have referred to the fact that certain prices were tentatively agreed upon by certain coal operators, and so forth; and now these coal operators are deliberately misrepresenting the situation to the public. As proof of my statement, I want to send to the desk to have read a circular letter which is being sent out by the Harlan Coal Co., of Louisville, Ky., in which they suggest that prices have been fixed by governmental agencies. It is not true, and they know it is not true, and yet they make that statement. I ask that the letter which I send to the desk may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE HARLAN COAL CO.,
Louisville, Ky., July 7, 1917.

To customers:

Since the conference at Washington, which resulted in the fixing of maximum coal prices by governmental authorities, it has, in our opinion, become clearly evident that the program agreed to has the support of an unquestionable majority of the members of the coal industry.

Any further discussion, therefore, as to whether this program is legally valid or enforceable loses much of its interest to us, and we intend to abide by it. We expect that another basis will very shortly be created for the coal industry.

Such tonnage of Black Beauty coal as we have free of engagement prior to July 1 will be offered at $3.75 for domestic sizes and $3.25 for nut and slack, and these prices will include the one and only authorized commission for selling which is limited to 25 cents per ton.

Yours, very truly,

K. U. MEGUIRE,
President and General Manager.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, Mr. President, just a word further on that subject. That coal is from a district where last year they were furnishing coal at $1.25 a ton. I have a letter from a large tool-steel company, inclosing to me the letter which I have had read, in which they make this statement:

[From Columbia Tool Steel Co.]

As stated to you in my letter June 26, our contract with the Wyatt Coal Co. last year for gas coal from the Kentucky district was $1.25 per ton at the mine

Yet the prices they now ask are $3.25 and $3.75 per ton. Of course, they are waxing fat at the present time. I think the President's timely words about patriotism and profits ought to be commended to some of these coal people.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am being diverted somewhat from what I meant to discuss when I arose, but before proceeding I want to commend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. He is doing excellent work in connection with this coal investigation, and he knows that a great deal of information obtained in connection with this matter was received from the Federal Trade Commission, largely as the result of a resolution adopted on my motion in the Senate some weeks ago. I join with the Senator from Ohio, and I will join with any other Senator, to bring about a condition of affairs that will stop this looting of the public by some of the coal operators and speculators of the country; but, Mr. President, because perhaps of the action of some minor board of the National Defense Council, which has been built up under the leadership of the President of the United States, rendering valuable service, as it has, in many directions, existing, as it does, because of the President's own party leadership, I am not willing to tear it down by indirect legislation. If it is wise to so change the law as to affect those who may attempt to take advantage of their position upon these advisory boards, I will join with other Senators in legislating in that direction; but I know of very many instances where much advantage has come to the Government because of the existence of these boards.

I was reading a moment ago from an article in this morning's paper when interrupted by the Senator from Missouri. I continue. Secretary Lane says:

But when Congress provided for this council it created a supplemental body, which is sometimes confused with the council itself, which is called the advisory commission, and these are real business men. They are nominated to the President by the council and appointed by him. These gentlemen donated their services.

These men, Mr. President, have been in Washington for months, performing patriotic service for the Nation without compensation, and I am not willing to stand here in the Senate and permit the condemnation of men, if only by inference, who are rendering such valuable service to the Government.

My attention was called the other day to the petroleum situation. I observe that the chairman of the subcommittee on petroleum is the president of the Standard Oil Co., and those associated with him are active officers of the leading oil companies of the Nation. I know the chairman of the committee; I do not know the other members of it; but I am not willing to criticize men who come here to Washington on the invitation of the Government, and who to-day sit in council with the Secretary of the Navy and advise as to the ways and means for the purchase of their products at a price much below the market value.

I am told—and perhaps some Senator here has absolute knowledge of it—that the petroleum interests of this Nation have, after conference with the Secretary of the Navy, arranged to continue the contract prices made last fall right into September without any additional pay, and that they have arranged with the Navy Department to be responsible for deliveries at any port or point in the country which the Secretary of the Navy may from time to time indicate. If these men are performing this patriotic service without any additional compensation, without pay, then I am not ready to condemn them.

Mr. NEW. Will the Senator from New York yield for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. NEW. I agree absolutely with what the Senator says, to the effect that nothing should be said here which either directly or by inference reflects upon the patriotism or character of service which has been rendered by many of the gentlemen who constitute this advisory council. Of my own knowledge. I know of one corporation which has spent half a million dollars in the perfection of a device—I am not at liberty, and it would not be policy at this time, to state what it is—but I know it is true that that amount of money has been spent by one corporation in the perfecting of an important device, intended for their own use, but which is now desired by the Government. The officers of that company are in Washington; their engineers are here, without expense to the Government, but at the expense of the corporation itself. All of that investment has been wiped out; not a cent of remuneration is expected or desired by the corporation; but the result of what has been accomplished by them up to this time, through their own individual effort and expense, has been turned over to the United States Government, and those officers and those engineers are to-day cooperating with the Government in the effort further to perfect, for Government uses and under Government auspices, the device which this company has been working upon so long and at so much expense.

Mr. President, the corporation I have in mind is not the only concern which has been rendering a similar service to the Government. Perhaps some of the others have not spent quite so much money as the one to which I have referred, but they have spent very large sums.

To my mind, Mr. President, there can be no finer evidence of unselfish patriotism than has been furnished by these gentlemen and the concerns they represent, and I am very sure that the Senate does not desire in any way to suggest anything that can reflect upon the motives or the services of men who have done this altogether creditable thing.

My understanding of this section is the same as the Senator from New York says his is, and not in accordance with that of the Senator from Iowa. I can very readily see that fundamentally it is certainly correct that men should not be allowed to dictate prices of the particular commodities which they have to sell to the Government of the United States; but I am quite as sure that there is no disposition, on the part of the men whom I have in mind at least, to do any such thing.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have in my hand a list of the subcommittees of the advisory commission. I note the cooperative committee on cotton goods, the cooperative committee on woolen manufactures, the cooperative committee on shoes and leather, and the cooperative committee on knit goods. The men on these committees are the leaders in their respective lines in the business of the country. No one would think of inviting gentlemen to come to Washington to advise on cotton goods, woolen goods, shoe and leather industries, or knit goods without asking these very men. They compete constantly with each other, and, perhaps, unwittingly, unknowingly, they may sell goods to the Government through some subsidiary company or through some agent of theirs; but to say that the Government should be denied the opportunity of using the services of these men because, forsooth, they may at some time or other do some business with the Government is going pretty far afield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that section 3 would not prevent any such course of dealing as the Senator suggests. It would not interfere with these gentlemen in what they are doing in that line. The only thing that it would interfere with, if they should do it, would be the procuring or attempting to procure or making a contract for themselves or their firms. That is all there is in it. I have served with the Senator for quite a while in another body and have served a short time with him here, and I know him so well that I feel confident he would not countenance on the part of these gentlemen or any other gentlemen acting as the agents of the Government in such a capacity, either their procuring or attempting to procure or making any contract for themselves or for their firms or corporations.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, fundamentally there is no difference between the Senator from Tennessee and myself; but I did not feel that I could permit the criticism of some of the great business men of our country to go without saying something in their behalf. These men have gathered here and assisted in mobilizing the industries of the country. They have been engaged, without profit to themselves, in coordinating the different lines of endeavor. For that they are entitled to the highest commendation on the part of the Government and on the part of all the American people.

Mr. President, the coal industry has been referred to. I have no words of criticism of the men connected with that industry serving on the subcommittee on coal of the advisory council, because I have no knowledge that they have connived or endeavored to connive against the interests of the Government, and have used their positions to that end. If they have, they should be condemned; but I am not willing to condemn all the rest even if this be true, and I submit, Mr. President, the men who have come here and given their time and rendered valuable service to the Government ought to have the thanks of Congress. I know many of them, and I want personally here and now to express my appreciation of the work that many of them have rendered the country in its critical hour.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say just one word in regard to the question now before us. If it is to be seriously discussed, if there is to be any real effort made to strike this section out of the bill, I want the Senate assembled and the discussion to take place in a very serious way. I do not believe there will be serious opposition to the section. Therefore, what I have to say is to be very brief. I hope we will get a vote on this section, and that we may proceed to a point where the Gore substitute can be offered, in order that we may determine which bill is to be perfected, and which is to become a law, if either.

But somewhat in reply to the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], let me say that no man has any right at this time to assail the motives of other men unless there be some evidence upon which to base the accusation. The President of the United States has seen fit to ask men to come to Washington to act in an advisory capacity, and a partial list of those men has been printed in a document which bears the title, "Priorities of shipments bill," and so forth.

I say that no honest man will want to sit in advice upon a matter in which he is pecuniarily interested and the Government of the United States is about to invest or purchase. That sort of thing has been condemned by every law writer who has ever touched the subject, by every court that has ever been called upon to decide it, by every man who has ever written of morals, business or otherwise. It is not a matter open for discussion that the practice to which I have just alluded should be always kept illegal in our country, and it is illegal now under a statute which has been upon the books since March 2, 1863.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not believe there is a Senator who disagrees with the proposition the Senator is making; but does not the Senator think that these gentlemen, acting on the committees and in an advisory capacity, could still act in that capacity and on the committees they are now on without doing violence to the proprieties?

Mr. REED. Why, Mr. President, I think that the men who are now acting purely in an advisory capacity, as I understand that capacity, as I understand the President's intention in calling them together, can properly act; but I do not understand that the President has intended for a moment to have these men come and sit on their own cases, their own contracts, their own business, or to hold positions of such a nature as to enable them to exercise a controlling voice or a potential voice in the matter of their own contracts.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I fully concur in that statement.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator does.

Mr. CALDER. Why, of course.

Mr. REED. Neither should they be placed in a position of temptation, as was suggested by the Senator from Tennessee. This section as it stands, without any amendment, goes no further than to cut clean the line beyond which they can not go; and, so far as I am concerned, I will not give my vote or my consent to whittling it down a particle.

Now, just a moment with reference to this matter. I stated in the beginning that I have no desire to reflect upon any man, but I find in the list of names appearing in this pamphlet—and I call special attention to this—the following:

Committee on steel and steel products: Elbert H. Gary, American Iron and Steel Institute, 71 Broadway, New York, chairman; James H. Burden, Troy, N. Y.; E. A. S. Clarke, president Lackawanna Steel Co., 2 Rector Street, New York; Alva C. Dinkey, vice president Midvale Steel Co., Philadelphia, Pa.; James Farrell, 71 Broadway, New York; Willis L. King; Charles M. Schwab, chairman of board Bethlehem Steel Co., 111 Broadway, New York; John A. Topping, chairman Republic Iron & Steel Co., 17 Battery Place, New York.

Mr. President, there are embraced the names of the steel kings of the United States, and I do not use the term at all in any approbrious manner. They command the business; they command the prices; they fix the prices; and now they are assembled in Washington for the purpose of advising our Government with reference to what prices our Government ought to pay for steel. That is their business. Let us see how they have performed that office.

I read:

In these days of our supreme trial, when we are sending hundreds of thousands of our young men across the seas to serve a great cause, no true man who stays behind to work for them and sustain them by his labor will ask himself what he is personally going to make out of that labor.

No true patriot will permit himself to take toll of their heroism in money or seek to grow rich by the shedding of their blood. He will give as freely and with as unstinted self-sacrifice as they. When they are giving their lives, will he not give at least his money?

I hear it insisted that more than a just price, more than a price that will sustain our industries, must be paid; that it is necessary to pay very liberal and unusual profits in order to "stimulate" production; that nothing but pecuniary rewards will do it—rewards paid in money, not in the mere liberation of the world.

Mr. President, whom do you think the President was talking about when he said:

I hear it insisted that more than a just price * * * must be paid.

What was the subject matter with which he was dealing? You know the current history of yesterday and the day before. You know what the point of controversy was. It was the price of steel; and the question was whether our Government would be compelled to pay, for the steel that was going into the ships, what were claimed to be two or three prices.

About whom was the President talking?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I will yield in a moment.

Let me turn for a moment to the shipowners of the United States. He discusses them; he discusses high freight rates; he discusses the general question of profits; and then he adds:

The thing has happened naturally enough, because the commercial processes which we are content to see operate in ordinary times have without sufficient thought been continued into a period where they have no proper place.

I am not questioning motives. I am merely stating a fact, and stating it in order that attention may be fixed upon it. The fact is that those who have fixed war freight rates have taken the most effective means in their power to defeat the armies engaged against Germany—

And so on. So that he is referring now to all of these people who are fixing extortionate prices; and, among others, I ask, was he not referring to the steel people?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connnecticut?

Mr. REED. In a moment.

The answer to that may be found in the fact that on yesterday morning the papers carried this headline—and I read from the Washington Post:

Steel men blocked—Headed by Judge Gary, they talk prices with Secretary Baker—All depends on President—Chilled by hint that Government take over entire output—No answer in sight to question whether Government will allow liberal profits or limit them to 10 per cent above cost—In a quandary, magnates may remain in Washington a week.

Now, here is this anomaly: A committee is appointed to advise the Government with reference to steel and steel contracts. At the head of that committee is Judge Gary; and yet we find Judge Gary called before the Secretary of War, and there Judge Gary is insisting upon prices which have been condemned by our Government as extortionate; and the article goes on to state that most of these steel man have left the city in disgust because they could not have their way.

Now, of what value is that kind of advice? Of what aid is that kind of assistance? How much good is done the Government by men sitting to advise as to prices who demand such prices for themselves that the Government declares the prices to be extortionate, and all the world knows them to be extortionate? The prices of steel have mounted to a degree that is absolutely appalling and scandalous. According to one report that I heard, the Government has been asked to pay $95 a ton for steel that the manufacturers were ready to furnish at $50 a ton only a short time back.

There is a use that these great magnates could be to our Government if they would serve in that capacity. If, for instance, our Government desired to know how quickly steel could be made, what means would be necessary to enlarge plants, what costs would be, and so forth, these great masters of manufacturing and business could be of great use. But is there any good purpose to be served by their sitting to advise the Government with reference to prices when they demand these frightful prices?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CALDER. Was it not the purpose of this subcommittee on steel, when appointed by the Council of National Defense, to do just the very thing the Senator suggested in the last sentence? Was not the object that they might be brought here so that they could mobilize their products, so that they could discuss ways and means of getting steel to the coast or to places where the Government needed it?

Mr. REED. And with that purpose, let me interject, this bill will not interfere at all. This bill will in no manner interfere with their coming and telling the President of the United States: "We can produce so many tons of steel of a certain kind within a given period. We can enlarge our plants within a given period. We can and will produce so much if it is ordered." All of that can be done and will not be interfered with at all by this bill. But if they sit down and try to let a contract with themselves or fix a price for their own benefit, they will come within the sweep of this bill, and they ought to.

Mr. CALDER. And if they do, they ought to come within the purview of the bill. I have no conception that the heads of departments of this Government would be so remiss in their duty as to permit men in a certain line of endeavor to make prices for themselves.

Mr. REED. Well, then——

Mr. CALDER. But, if the Senator will yield a moment longer, here these great captains of industry have met together in Washington in the last day or two at the request of the department heads They have conferred with the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War, and they have gone home with a statement from the heads of the Government that they must sell their products at a price fixed by the Government; and they have agreed to it and have gone home to arrange their business accordingly.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; they have not agreed to it.

Mr. CALDER. I only know what I read in this morning's New York paper.

Mr. REED. Perhaps my statement was too positive. My information was that they went home practically saying: "Well, we will wait and see. We do not know what may happen."

Mr. CALDER. It is because of the fact that the Government was able to bring here these men of large business affairs that the Government was able to know, at the end of their conference, that it could get the product for the price the Government fixed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. Yes. I just want to say that it seems now that the Senator could have no objection to this section as it stands, because the language of it does not cover the acts he is talking about.

Mr. CALDER. If I am mistaken in that, I have no more to say.

Mr. REED. I yield the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. All I wanted to say was this: Unquestionably the purpose of the act creating the Council of National Defense was to establish just such an advisory commission as we have had; but there is not a line or a scintilla in that act that authorizes the advisory commission or the committees thereof to have a single thing to do with the awarding of contracts or the fixing of prices for the contracts. They are acting beyond and outside of any authority in that act whenever they undertake to do so; and this amendment simply makes it obligatory upon the Council of National Defense and its advisory commission not to go outside of the original act that created them.

There is not the slightest intereference with the operations or the activities of the board or these committees. They can do their patriotic service without let or hindrance. There is no reason on earth why these great captains of industry can not give the Government the benefit of their advice, the benefit of their knowledge, the benefit of their power. The only thing that is prohibited under this section is that they can not award contracts or advise the award of contracts or secure the award of contracts and they can not fix the prices at which they may sell goods to the Government. If there is anything unfair about it I am wholly unable to understand the English language.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. I understand there are just two things that can be done by the National Council of Defense. One is to investigate and the other is to recommend. Surely the advisory commission can do no more than the council itself.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the Senator is perfectly correct about that. This whole trouble, if trouble it is, this whole question, arises out of the fact that some misguided members of the advisory board or commission have gone beyond their power, and it has gotten to be a matter of common understanding everywhere that they have done so.

This proposed legislation does not interfere in the slightest with the powers or the activities or the operations or the benefits that are to accrue to the Government coming from the organization of the Council of National Defense. It does not interfere with it at all, and anyone who says that this prohibition of contract making and price making of contracts interferes with the Council of National Defense or will put it out of business, as has been suggested, simply does not know what he is talking about. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] the other day and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to-day produced section 1783 of the Revised Statutes, which provides practically the same thing, but this is specific and ought to be passed, and I sincerely hope the Senate will pass it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this morning in reading the Washington Post I came across an editorial headed "Prices and profits," which seems to me to be so thoroughly and completely a reply to some observations made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday, I believe it was, possibly day before yesterday, that I beg leave to have it read and inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

PRICES AND PROFITS.

The President's call to American industry to show its patriotism is a document that strikes a responsive chord in every corner of the Union. The document is timely, for there had appeared a formidable movement in behalf of extra profits on the ground that production must be stimulated. While Mr. Wilson recognizes the fact that production must be stimulated, he does not admit that the only way to stimulate it is to pay excessive prices. On the contrary, he thinks excessive prices are unpatriotic, and he asks producers to quit talking patriotism if they insist upon extra profits.

The desire of the people and the Government can be expressed in general terms. The President's statement expresses the popular desire exactly. But when the Government and producers try to agree upon specific figures, it is seen that the proposition is hedged about with difficulties. The steel manufacturers have been unable to get any satisfaction from the Government as to the proper price of steel. The Government is equally in the dark as to the price that it should pay. No one knows the cost of steel. The best that can be done at this time is to refer the question of cost to the Federal Trade Commission, in the hope that a figure may be worked out that will be accepted as accurate. Upon that figure a "reasonable profit" will then be allowed. In the meantime contracts must be made in tentative form.

It is just that the public and allied nations should pay the same price for materials as is paid by the Government. The Government would gain nothing by cutting prices down for itself and leaving the public to struggle with unregulated prices. Nor would it be playing the part of a faithful ally if it should squeeze producers down in its own behalf and then permit producers to charge excessive profits on materials furnished to the allies If a fair price can be ascertained, and a reasonable profit added, the Government, the allies, and the public should all be treated alike. If this can not be done without commandeering all the product by the Government, then machinery must be set up for the equitable distribution of steel products to the public after the national war needs are filled.

One of the most important features of the President's statement is that relating to ocean freight rates. These rates are ridiculously and extortionately high. They are utterly out of relation to the value of the service rendered. Unless voluntarily reduced by the shipowners, there will be abundant ground for charging this interest with lack of patriotism. From that point to drastic action is but a step, especially after the public has been aroused. Mr. Wilson gives no hint that compulsion will be used to force down ocean rates. He appeals to the patriotism of the men interested. Nevertheless, there is reason to believe that power exists to control ocean rates and that this power will be exercised soon through an international shipping commission composed of representatives of the principal allies.

The President speaks with moderation when he states that war operations are hampered because of high ocean rates. When the private interests controlling shipping collect $100 a ton on coal from the United States to Italy, it is apparent that Italy can not have a free hand in fighting the war. Considering the shortage of coal and the extortionate freight rates, it is surprising that Italy has done so well on the battle fronts. This state of affairs must be changed by the great allies. They must put the screws upon shipping, without regard to flag, if the rates are not voluntarily brought down.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I shall take just a moment to discuss the law creating the Council of National Defense and the advisory commission. I think there has been a misapprehension either on the part of some of the Members of the Senate or on the part of members of the advisory commission as to their duties under the law. I have seen it stated in the papers that if the proposed law which is now pending before Congress became effective the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense would have to disband and go back to their homes and cease rendering to the Government patriotic and volunteer duty. Now, that is not true. If they do what the law of their creation contemplates there is no question but that they can continue to render services to their country even if the section now under discussion is enacted into law.

I am going to call attention to the law creating the Council of National Defense and the advisory commission and endeavor to show that they have no power to make any contract and are simply doing something beyond their power and beyond their sphere if they attempt to. Now, note, Mr. President. The law creating the Council of National Defense provides:

> That the Council of National Defense shall nominate to the President, and the President shall appoint, an advisory commission, consisting of not more than seven persons, each of whom shall have special knowledge of some industry, public utility, or the development of some natural resource, or be otherwise specially qualified, in the opinion of the council, for the performance of the duties hereinafter provided.

There is nothing in that which gives the advisory commission any power at all. Even the Council of National Defense can not make any contract; they simply act in an advisory capacity themselves.

Now, note what the advisory board can do. I am reading from the document to which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] called attention, and that is the law creating the Council of National Defense. It provides:

> That the Council of National Defense shall adopt rules and regulations for the conduct of its work, which rules and regulations shall be subject to the approval of the President, and shall provide for the work of the advisory commission to the end that the special knowledge of such commission may be developed by suitable investigation, research, and inquiry and made available in conference and report for the use of the council.

There is expressed the power of the advisory commission. Their duty is to assist the Council of National Defense in making investigations and reporting the results thereof to the Council of National Defense. So the law of their creation neither authorizes nor confers the power of making contracts. The distinguished gentlemen who constitute the Council of National Defense and those who constitute the advisory commission can and do render the Government very great assistance; I know from personal knowledge that they have done so more than once. In the investigation of the steel industry, who knows more about it than Mr. Gary, for instance; who knows more about the transportation question than Mr. Willard; who knows more about all the particular subjects to which these men have been assigned than the men named? But their duties begin and end when they investigate and report the result of their efforts in developing information.

Mr. President, if any of them have gone further than this law to which I have called attention, and that is the law of their creation—the beginning and the end of their power—if they have gone further than this charter of their powers and have entered into contractual relations with the Government itself or have sold their goods to the Government themselves, then they have simply violated the law and the statute now proposed simply directs attention to that and prevents it in the future.

The point I desire to make is that every one of these men composing the council and the commission can continue to act in the capacity contemplated by the statute of their creation and violate no law, nor even violate the law we propose. I think the statute we propose ought to be enacted as a safeguard, so that no man will undertake to act for himself and for the Government at the same time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] stated that this advisory council had exceeded their powers. I ask the Senator from Tennessee in what respect the Council of National Defense or the advisory commission have exceeded their powers?

Mr. MCKELLAR. As I read the testimony of Secretary Baker, taken before the House Committee, and as I recall it—I have it not before me, but I am sure the Senator will recollect; probably he has read it himself—he stated that the advisory committee recommended the contracts and the prices at which the contracts were let, and that the War Department accepted those recommendations and entered into the contracts as advised by this committee or these committees. If such is the case, they have exceeded their power, in my judgment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the members of the advisory council have advised, and I have no doubt they have answered whatever questions were asked them about what was a fair price, and the quality of the materials, and anything that was germane to the subject about which the Government was inquiring.

If the members of the advisory committee are the guilty parties the Senator from Missouri says the President denounced in his speech the other day, and especially the steel magnates, as he calls them, the remedy for the situation is entirely in the President's hands. The President appointed these gentlemen, called them to his assistance, and I can scarcely believe that he is denouncing his own appointees in public and sustaining them in office at the same time. If they are the corrupt and guilty people who are holding up the Government and throttling it and robbing it, the President should not denounce them in public and keep them in office, but he should simply dismiss them from their office. What the facts are about this matter, of course, I do not know, and I do not think that charges ought to be made unless they can be based upon facts.

Mr. President, I put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the other day, when this general subject was up for discussion—it will be found in the RECORD of July 3, 1917, at page 4661, commencing at the first column at the bottom of the page and continuing for many pages—the report of the director of the advisory commission to the Secretary of War. It is replete with information showing the great work which has been done by this advisory commission and the vast field which it covers. I do not suppose the commission has made any contracts with itself. I do not suppose it has any authority in the law to make a contract, but I do suppose that these great men, representing so large a percentage of the coordinated industries of the country when they have advised the Government about the state of the market, or when it would be advisable to make purchases or how much should be given to particular factories for making supplies, have given their opinion about things in which they might be interested if the Government took their advice. If you are going to have the opinion of the best experts in the country, I do not believe the war can be conducted without buying something of somebody who may directly or indirectly have a certain interest in what the Government needs.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment? Long before the act was passed creating the Council of National Defense I had been in consultation with Mr. Godfrey, who is a member of the council, a very distinguished man, connected with the Drexel Institute, and a scientist connected with Columbia University. I think they conferred at the same time with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. They may have conferred with the President. Those gentlemen had been devoting months in collecting information that would be valuable to the Government if the United States became involved in war. For instance, they ascertained and had a card-index system by which they could in a few moments advise as to every industrial enterprise in the United States that manufactured things that would be used in war. Not only could they do that but they were able to report as to the raw materials that enter into every article that could be used for war purposes. There is no telling how much these gentlemen spent of time and money in their patriotic efforts. Now, after the Council of National Defense was created, Mr. Godfrey was appointed one of its members, and he is possessed of information that has been collected at an enormous personal expense.

Mr. President, that method of investigation comes clearly within the powers and duties of this advisory commission. That is all that is contemplated by the act of their creation. Secretary Lane has discussed at length the question of the powers, duties, and methods of the Council of National Defense and advisory commission, and I ask leave to have printed as a part of my remarks his statement in the New York Times of this morning. Coming from a member of the Cabinet and one of the Council of National Defense, it is illuminating as well as complete.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LANE DEFENDS ADVISORY BOARD—MEMBERS PATRIOTIC AND WOULD NOT EXPLOIT GOVERNMENT IF THEY COULD, SECRETARY SAYS—TELLS OF GREAT PROBLEMS—PRICES FOR COMMODITIES MUST BE REASONABLE, AND NOBODY PERMITTED TO GET RICH OUT OF THE WAR.

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1917.

The relationship of business men to the Government was described to-day by Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior and one of the six Cabinet members who compose the Council of National Defense. Answering talk in Congress and elsewhere suggesting that members of the council were in position to make contracts with themselves and thus derive personal profit from the war, Mr. Lane said the business men composing the advisory commission had no control over contracts, and in fact gave to the Government infinitely more than they received. Analyzing the organization further, Mr. Lane gave high praise to the business men, experts in their several fields of industry, who comprise the many committees on supplies, including raw materials of all kinds and manufactures.

The statement was given to the Associated Press as the result of inquiries concerning recent criticism of the commission and a persistent report that reorganization of the council was imminent. The response was characteristically frank from the opening question, which bore on the possibility of Cabinet members constituting the council making any personal profit out of contracts.

"We have nothing to sell," he said. "When it is considered that the Council of National Defense consists of Secretary Baker, a lawyer; Secretary Daniels, an editor; Secretary Lane, a lawyer; Secretary Houston, a college president; Secretary Redfield, a retired business man; and Secretary Wilson, a labor-union official, you will realize that there is not much chance for that charge being true.

THE COUNCIL BUYS NOTHING.

"No; nobody thinks that we are dealing with ourselves. The confusion has come about because of the peculiar organization of the council. Get into your head one of two facts, and you will see how this confusion has arisen. The Council of National Defense buys nothing. That body was created by Congress as a measure of preparedness to mobilize resources—a sort of stock-taking body.

"If we came to war, what did we have in the way of resources to make war with? That was the idea. It is not a war council in the English sense, which can direct policies. The President is our war council. It is not a purchasing board, because there is not a man on it who can buy anything excepting the Secretaries of War and the Navy, and the council can not direct them what to buy.

"But it is a very important board, nevertheless; it is supposed to know just what the Government needs for the carrying on of the war, and just where that can be had. Regard its make-up and you will see that. The Secretaries of War and the Navy know what the Army and Navy need. The Secretary of the Interior, who has the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines under him, is supposed to know what minerals this country produces and how they can be had. The Secretary of Agriculture knows what the food supply is and how it may be stimulated. The Secretary of Commerce knows what we can get abroad and what we manufacture here. And the Secretary of Labor is in touch with the great primary force essential to all production.

"But when Congress provided for this council it created a supplemental body, which is sometimes confused with the council itself, which is called the advisory commission, and these are real business men. They are nominated to the President by the council and appointed by him. These gentlemen donate their services, and were chosen because they were specialists, successful specialists. I doubt if any country in Europe could produce a finer body."

Mr. Lane reviewed briefly the achievements in the business world of those who comprised the advisory commission.

"The function of these gentlemen," he said, "is to advise the Council of National Defense. They make no contracts. They have no executive or administrative power.

"That is the full legal machinery—a council of Cabinet officers, complemented by an advisory commission of business men. Congress created both bodies."

QUICK ACTION NECESSARY.

The Secretary's attention was directed to the fact that much of the criticism had been aimed at the committee of business men who advised the council respecting copper, lumber, and other subjects requiring technical knowledge.

"What part do these men play?" he was asked.

"That is a simple story. When the war came we had card indexes and reports by the carload. But these could not be converted into guns and airplanes. We had to move quickly. So the council sent for men who had been in Europe and knew what had been done in France and England, and gained the benefit of their experience. We listened for days to the purchasing agents and the reports of all the allied countries. They talked of commandeering all the primary resources of the country, the ores and the foods and the industrial plants. They told of the contracts they had made and the methods they had taken for paying for what they got.

"It was a thrilling tale of man's organizing skill, his quickness to adjust himself to conditions. We heard labor union men from the other side and manufacturers. And then we called in the representatives of the Army and the Navy and asked them what they had on hand and what they needed. We saw at once the size of the task. There never was one like it.

Undismayed, we determined on a start and a quick start. Now, if you wanted to know what lumber you could secure at once for building houses for a million men, what would you do? Or if you wanted copper for a billion shells or steel for 10,000 cannon? You would, of course, call together the men who knew how much lumber or copper or steel the country had or could produce. And if you wanted coal for the industries or oil for submarines, would you ignore the men who produce these things, and deal with them at long range, as if they were alien enemies? Of course not. You would call them to your side. Well, that is what the advisory commission told us we should do—get the business men of the country around the table to help out. And we did.

HAVE MORE THAN MADE GOOD.

"We roughly classified our needs and told the members of the advisory commission to recommend to us the men they thought were foremost in those lines of industry. And these men we turned into committees. It gave them standing to be organized. It made them properly feel that they were in the business of fighting Germany. Their boys were going to the trenches, and they were anxious to do their bit. These men who made up these committees came down here for the war—and they came down to help us. And they have helped us. They have worked day and night and paid their own way, crowded a half dozen in a room, and annoyed all the time because they couldn't satisfy their good strong Yankee executive instinct by doing things, instead of advising how they could be done. They made no contracts; they made no decisions. The contracts and the decisions were made by the only people who had the legal power, the Secretaries of War and the Navy.

"But these committees sat with the captains and colonels and admirals and told them how they, the industrial managers, would go about this unprecedented task if it was up to them—how they would build cities, with waterworks and sewers and electric lights and all complete for a million men in three months—how they would induce our great manufacturing plants to give up their trades and go into the business of making airships in a country that invented the airplane, and yet hasn't a capacity of 500 a year—how they would get lumber without bidding the market up.

"I have heard that some of these men were not as disinterested as they might be; that they wanted to make money. That wouldn't be unnatural if it was true. However, I have looked up all the rumors that have come to my attention and found them to be baseless—mere flings by the unsuccessful. Of course all can't be satisfied, and where things are done quickly there must be some mistakes. I honor those men, and I hope that Congress or some other authority will authorize for them an emblem similar to that given in Canada and elsewhere, showing that these men are in national service.

MUST HAVE FERVOR AND ENTHUSIASM.

"We can't make war without fervor and enthusiasm any more than we can run a revival meeting without them. There is no such thing as a cold-blooded democracy, and a democracy can't make war coldbloodedly. There is no passion that is manly that we should not use—pride, rivalry, the gang spirit, love of humanity, love of country. And the more proud or vain men are of working for the country the better work we will get. These committees have been, are, and will continue to be invaluable to the conduct of this war. In England they have 20 times as many as we have."

Mr. Lane did not contend that the organization as created was wholly satisfactory.

"No; it is not," he replied when asked the direct question. "It is an emergency organization. But it is along the right line. The council is planning a reorganization, which is now, I believe, up to the President, under which there will be greater consolidation and more direct control. Under our Constitution the President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He is the real head of our council. We recommend to him. He is the ultimate deciding and directing force."

When asked what was to prevent them from recommending favors to themselves in the form of high prices, Mr. Lane said:

"Three things—perhaps more. First, patriotism. There is a small percentage of American business men who would rob a church or an orphanage, but the percentage is negligible. Our business men come from the same stock as the rest of us and have got as high standards as any other class. And they have a bit more vision than most of us, because they have broader experience. The theory to work upon with the business man is the thing to use with the boy—that he is a patriot.

"So long as he was making money out of foreigners this theory was not usable. For business is war. That was the theory we have all been raised on. We learned it from Adam Smith and Ricardo, and Mill, and Spencer. Only recently have we come to see that this theory must have its modifications. The abused socialists have been largely responsible for teaching us where we went to if we logically carried out the theory of unlimited competition.

"So the business men took all the traffic would bear from the allies, as they did from the public. But when this country is threatened, when our national life is at stake, the making of money becomes secondary. This is not mere idealism or theory. It is fact, and the business man knows it.

SENTIMENT NOT A DEAD THING.

"So I say the first call upon the business man is the patriotic call I took a man from a $30,000 place and put him to work at $2,500 by telling him that he had a call to the colors. Sentiment is not a dead thing. The railroad men at the time of the threatened national strike yielded to it; so did the coal men when they volunteered to cut their prices over 30 per cent.

"Then there is the gang spirit. Men are like boys in this, too: they like to work together, whether for good or otherwise. The whole theory of the law of supply and demand is set aside at such a time. Just a little cooperation—that's the effect of the gang spirit—and a little direction, and you have nine-tenths of the business men doing exactly what you wish them to do."

"But the other tenth?"

"Yes; that wicked twelfth juror must be reckoned with. And for him there are two medicines: First, the gang spirit applied by his fellows, and then, if that does not effect a cure, there must be the strong hand; for we need his output, and he must be made to play the game, even if he is not willing.

"This problem of getting reasonable prices, which is the one England and France have had to meet, and which should not be permitted to hold back our work, may be met, then, in three ways: By the appeal to patriotism; if this fails, by the fixing of prices; then, if no practicable way is found to do this, by commandeering the resource, industry, or plant. Cooperation first, coercion by price fixing, second; commandeering of plant, third. This is the practical program.

"For this war must be won, and the last ton of ore, the last pound of steel, the last bale of cotton, the last sheaf of wheat will be needed. We must not hesitate to do the drastic thing if it is to be the effective thing. It is the supremely effective thing that we want. But the second and the third steps will rarely be needed if we say just what we want our people to do. I have yet to see the man who will say, 'I am for money out of this war at the expense of the Government or of the people!' There must be some one to say what should be done. Congress can do it if it will take 80 or 90 per cent of all war profits.

NOT TO MAKE ANY MAN RICH.

"This war is not to make any man rich. There will be a revolution in the country if business works to that end, and socialism will surely come. The best protection to industry now is to see that industry is not allowed to take what it can get. To indulge selfishness, the selfishness which underlies trade in normal times, is to bring about the governmental ownership and operation of industries which have never been thought of as public utilities. So that this is a time when, by following the 'business-as-usual' standard, you will put yourself out of business. We must have more business of some kinds and less of other kinds, and profits must not climb, or the people will pull down the ladder.

"I am persuaded that these reasons of expediency and far-sighted policy are realized by our industrial leaders. The most of them need no such danger as a threat. They will do what they are told to do in the name of the Nation. And I favor telling them just what we want and letting them unite in every honorable way to bring about the end we seek. Direction—that is the word. And the Government must have a board that will say who comes first and what comes first, a real priority commission. Otherwise all will be confusion and the law of competition, instead of working to lower prices, will work to raise them, for, instead of industries competing against each other for orders, the purchasers will be bidding against each other as at an auction sale, as they are to-day.

"Suppose that some one were to come forward to-day with an invention that would effectively sweep the ocean of submarines, a machine invaluable to us and to our allies? Would we allow him to fix his own price? No one would think of pursuing such a policy. We would ask what he wished, and if his price was exorbitant we would take his invention and talk price later. But we would negotiate first and be fair with him. The policeman's billy would not fall on his head unless he resisted.

"One of the great difficulties in price fixing, either by groups of industries or by the Government, is that some industries are so much better run than others or have superior natural advantages. Here are five railroads running between two points. One can live and make a profit on a dollar a ton; perhaps four can run on that same figure; but the fifth needs a dollar and a quarter. We need all the roads. We, therefore, can not make a rate of a dollar without bankrupting the fifth road. Why not make the rate $1.25 and take from the four roads as a war profit the extra 25 cents, or a large part of it? Or, why not make the rate $1 and pay the difference to the fifth road out of the Government's Treasury? Or, why not pool the earnings of all and give to each only a fair profit? This is a simple illustration of a perplexing problem which runs all through the economics of our situation.

INEQUALITIES OF PRODUCTION COST.

"We need all the steel we can get; every furnace must be kept hot. One plant can make it cheaper than others. Shall we pay that plant only its costs plus a profit and pay the others on the same basis? Who will be forced to take the product of the plants where the cost is highest? Shall we strike an average that will give some a rich profit and others none at all? Or shall we allow prices to be fixed by competition and, after allowing to each a good profit, take for the war in taxes all the surplus? That can be done.

"Whatever method is followed, the supreme end to be sought is the stimulation of output. Every railroad car must be made to carry its full load just as often as possible, and every mine must yield as much of its deposit as can be blasted out. That means efficient, pushing, enthusiastic administration and labor. Those men must be made to feel that they are doing Uncle Sam's work, soldiers in Woodrow Wilson's Army, battling to make the world safe for democracy. They must have countenance, appreciation, honor, and reward—and none of them skimped. The man who killed the goose that laid the golden egg thought he was a genius, but the world holds him to be a fool.

"So far as the war news of the Government is concerned, the answer to any criticism is that, whenever tested, the administration has met the situation. For instance, Secretary McAdoo floated the unprecedented liberty loan with speed and a 50 per cent oversubscription; Secretary Baker has sent to Europe our first division in such a way as meets the full expectation of both our own people and the allies; Secretary Daniels has his fleet of destroyers moving in foreign waters; Secretary Houston's campaign for great food production has succeeded even beyond expectation; and so with Secretary Redfield's dealings with foreign commerce as export executive, and Secretary Wilson's handling of the difficulties arising out of the labor situation. The trial so far made has proved that the Cabinet and the Council have been a disappointment only to those who did not wish them well."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I think the adoption of the amendment in the form in which it stands would simply operate to disrupt the advisory commission. If no member of the advisory commission can advise or attempt to procure or procure or make any contracts for the purchase of any supplies for the use of the Government, either from himself or from a firm of which he is a member, or from a corporation of which he is an officer or a stockholder, or if he has any financial interest, then I do not see where the Government is to get its information about these matters. If the Government desires to purchase horses and calls in a man who understands them and the price and the number in the market, and after he advises them about the contract he must not sell any horses himself, what business man engaged in business is going to advise the Government about anything of that kind if the effect of his advice or his attitude is to put him immediately out of the market?

Mr. President, it seems to me the business of buying these supplies could be conducted and should be conducted in a perfectly open public manner, and the prices should be known and they should be fair prices. If the prices are fair, and if it is true, as has been stated, that owing to the coordinated efforts of this advisory commission the prices of a great many things, including copper, which many Senators have referred to, and the efficient work of Mr. Baruch in getting that commodity at below the market price—if, in fact, the efforts of these gentlemen have resulted in the Government getting many articles at much less than the market price, and the contract has been made to furnish the Government at rates cheaper than any outside party could have gotten, it does not seem to me that the fact that some one of the advisory commission was interested in a business which had supplied a part of the things needed was of any harm to the American people.

As to the feeling of a gentleman who may be a member of the council as to whether it is embarrassing to him to sit there or not, that I do not pretend to deal with, but the whole matter is in the hands of the President of the United States. He can consult with these gentlemen, and the departments can when they want, and they need not have anything to do with them if they do not want to. If the advisory commission or any member of it commits any impropriety, the President can at once request his resignation, and if he does not resign he can dismiss him from office. I think we are making or attempting to make a mountain of sensation out of a mole hill of actualities.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I know the Senate is ready to vote on this question, and I do not intend to speak more than a minute or so.

I agree entirely with what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has said. I think it might be generally conceded that I would be one of the first on this floor to take advantage of any opportunity for fair criticism of inefficiency in administration in the conduct of war; and in criticizing inefficiency I believe I would be performing a real patriotic duty in bringing about a condition calculated to produce better and more effective results.

I do not believe anything is gained by mystery or silence, but that the example and experience of England have amply justified the widest publicity and criticism of inefficiency. I have been impressed with the candor and the freedom with which the statesmen in England and in France have admitted blunders and mistakes and have not hesitated to criticize army officers and cabinet officials. I for one intend to pursue that policy during this war period, and I believe it is the duty of every Senator to do the same.

We all note in the newspapers the criticism going on in England regarding the expeditionary force in Asia. A member of Parliament gets up and resigns his post in deference to that criticism. Such discussion is most commendable, in my opinion, and is bound to lead to more effective results in every nation where it prevails in the conduct of the war.

I only want to say that, as far as I know, there is up to the present time no ground for suspicion, and certainly no scandal has developed, in connection with these advisory boards. I know of numerous cases where the invitation to serve on these boards came like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky to many of these gentlemen, absolutely unsolicited, coming in the nature of a command, and they responded from pure patriotism.

I fully concede that in ordinary normal times for a person even to be on an advisory board in connection with Government contracts is calculated to arouse suspicion and to inevitably lead to scandal sooner or later; but we are not in normal times, Mr. President. We are in a war; and the patriotism of the American citizens of all classes and of all sections is supposed to be aroused. Men under these circumstances, and prompted by this lofty inspiration, will perform sacrifices and give services which they would not dream of doing in normal times of peace, when the ordinary promptings of business selfishness and business competition would naturally lead them to take advantage of every situation that might be offered to them. I believe that most of these men here in Washington, whatever party they may belong to, are actuated by that patriotic inspiration bred of this war condition.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question just there?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I agree entirely with what the Senator has been saying about the advisory council, but is there not some distinction between those who simply come and give their views and their work from purely patriotic motives and agents of the Government of whom we are having a great many appointed, salaried officers but not confirmed by the Senate, offices not created by statute?

Mr. PENROSE. I think there is a very great difference, and I was coming to that in a moment. I am glad to have the Senator from Massachusetts emphasize it. Of course, these salaried agents appointed, with their salaries and emoluments and status fixed by the arbitrary decree of an executive head, not filling an office provided for specifically by act of Congress and not coming within the classification of the civil-service rules, constitute an entirely different body of men from this particular class of volunteers. This aggregation of men who represent, in my opinion, the brains of America, the great men of America from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, are on an entirely different basis.

I know of one case, Mr. Samuel Vauclain, of Philadelphia, one of the most noticeable business men of that city and the State of Pennsylvania. I have asked him to give me the correspondence—I do not have it at hand—under which he came to Washington to serve on an advisory board, to act as chairman of a committee and to discharge many important functions, as he has been doing during the last several months. I wanted the correspondence so that I could read it to the Senate as an illustration. I have not got it here, but I will have it in a day or two and I shall take an opportunity to have it read. He received a letter from the Secretary of War entirely unexpectedly, without solicitation of course from himself or from any friend or person that I know of or he knows of, urging him to come to Washington and serve in some capacity on the advisory board. He replied to the Secretary of War that he was the president or director in a large number of the biggest corporations in the country, supplying munitions and other supplies to the Government to the extent not of many millions but of several hundred million dollars, and further than that he was the participant in contracts with France and the other allies to the extent of many million dollars more for locomotives and other supplies, and he did not think he ought to be called upon to serve on the advisory board under these circumstances, which were calculated naturally to arouse curiosity and suspicion.

Mr. Baker replied to Mr. Vauclain to the effect that the very reasons he advanced against his accepting the invitation were the very ones that prompted Mr. Baker to invite him, and that he commanded him to come to Washington and give his service to the Government on the advisory board. Shortly afterwards he came here, and, to the sacrifice of his own business interests—I might say almost to the entire neglect of them—he has acted for several months on such advisory board. I say without hesitation that he has probably rendered more effective work here in Washington than anybody connected with the administration of the War and Navy Departments. He would be one of the men, coming here without his own knowledge or solicitation, who would be debarred by what I thought was the intention of this amendment. But the Senator from Oregon—I only heard the latter part of his remarks to the Senate—I suppose I am correct in saying that in his opinion it would not cover such a case?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not see how it could, Mr. President. Let me say to the Senator again that, in my opinion, the gentlemen who are connected with these advisory boards, which have been appointed by the President under the authority of the law creating the Council of National Defense, have no other power given them by law than to make these investigations under rules and regulations adopted by the Council of National Defense and to report thereon. The Council of National Defense may make recommendations to the bureau—and, under the law, they have power to make recommendations—but they have not any power to conclude contracts. So, if the law which we are now contemplating were enacted, it would not reach these gentlemen unless they should transcend their powers and do something that they have not any power to do, just as any citizen might be prosecuted for violating the law; but they have no power under the law to do these things.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I fully understand that to be the view of the Senator, and that is the way I was endeavoring to construe it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. What meaning does the Senator give to the words in line 16, on page 3, "including an advisory capacity to any commission, board, or council of the Government"?

Mr. PENROSE. I think that it would cover the case of Mr. Vauclain and others to whom I referred, and would deprive the Government of their services.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me it unquestionably would.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me to go on a moment—perhaps it would not be right, and personally I would not be willing to clothe these gentlemen with the authority to award contracts; but it is most unfortunate, Mr. President, that they are only in an advisory capacity, because it is generally admitted by those familiar with the situation and by the business men who come here to Washington from all over the United States in hundreds and in thousands, that in numerous cases those having the power to award the contracts have displayed an ignorance of business conditions and an inefficiency, which, in my opinion, will c_ gall the American people when the facts are disclosed. It is like the sand going through an hourglass, which I think the Secretary of the Senate uses occasionally when the 5 or 10 minute rule is in force. The recommendations of the advisory board meet that narrow passage between the two glasses, and there they are checked and delayed while the allies are spending $100,000,000 every day and 10,000 men are slain on the field of battle.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from North Dakota——

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me one moment now, and then I shall be through?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Very well.

Mr. PENROSE. But, be that as it may, I am not making a plea for these gentlemen. They came here on the invitation of the Government, and if the present administration or the Senate or the House of Representatives desires to dispense with their services, I know that they will go home cheerfully and contentedly and attend to their business. The Government is a greater beneficiary by their services than anyone else. They are here at a loss and a sacrifice.

But I arose more particularly, Mr. President, to express my difference with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] as to his construction of section 3. In my opinion it does disbar these gentlemen serving on these advisory boards. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has referred to line 16, section 3, and I will read the language from the beginning of the section. It is as follows:

SEC. 3. That it is hereby declared unlawful for any person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the Government in any capacity, including an advisory capacity to any commission, board, or council of the Government, to procure, attempt to procure, or make any contract for the purchase of any supplies for the use of the Government either from himself, from any firm of which he is a member, or corporation of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in which he has any financial interest.

A paragraph like that must be construed as far as possible in the interest of protecting the Government, and I have grave doubt in my mind whether that would not exclude them; but I am certain they would be excluded when I come to the proviso in line 25, which reads:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to prevent any such agent or employee of the Government, or any person acting in an advisory capacity, from rendering services and advice on any matter—

Now, mark the words—

not connected with such purchase of supplies.

If that does not rule them out, language can not rule them out.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I still differ from the Senator from Pennsylvania. I may be mistaken in my view, but I again insist that under the law I am right. It must be remembered that the committee who reported the amendment under consideration had in mind the prevention of the purchase of goods from firms who were connected directly or indirectly with the Council of National Defense; in other words, preventing them from advising the purchase of goods from themselves, which they have no power to do, anyway. Referring again to the act, this is the duty of the Council of National Defense:

That it shall be the duty of the Council of National Defense to supervise and direct investigations and make recommendations to the President and the heads of executive departments as to the location of railroads with reference to the frontier of the United States so as to render possible expeditious concentration of troops and supplies to points of defense; the coordination of military, industrial, and commercial purposes in the location of extensive highways and branch lines of railroad; the utilization of waterways; the mobilization of military and naval resources for defense; the increase of domestic production of articles and materials essential to the support of armies and of the people during the interruption of foreign commerce; the development of seagoing transportation; data as to amounts, location, method and means of production, and availability of military supplies; the giving of information to producers and manufacturers as to the class of supplies needed by the military and other services of the Government, the requirements relating thereto, and the creation of relations which will render possible in time of need the immediate concentration and utilization of the resources of the Nation.

That is the power of the Council of National Defense. When you come to the advisory commission, who assist them in making the investigations in these various lines of activity, the statute goes on to provide:

That the Council of National Defense shall adopt rules and regulations for the conduct of its work, which rules and regulations shall be subject to the approval of the President, and shall provide for the work of the advisory commission to the end that the special knowledge of such commission may be developed by suitable investigation, research, and inquiry and made available in conference and report for the use of the council.

They do not have anything to do, except to assist in these investigations. They do not any of them have the power to make contracts. If there is anybody who has the power to make contracts, it is the members of the Cabinet who have such power, independently of their connection with the Council of National Defense.

Mr. WATSON. Suppose a member of the advisory commission were to seek to procure a contract for some enterprise in which he was a stockholder, and suppose that he did so, would he not fall within the provisions of this section?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He might do that; but he has no right to do it.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely. What can he do, therefore, without coming within the provisions of this law?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He can assist in making any of these investigations provided by the act creating the advisory commission, and report to the Council of National Defense, as the law requires.

Mr. WATSON. Let me ask the Senator whether that is not the very cause of the criticism that is now being heaped upon these people?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; the criticism that is being directed to these gentlemen is that they are making contracts practically with themselves for the Government while acting in a fiduciary capacity. I do not know of any case where that has been done, but that is the criticism.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for the Senator from Oregon to reiterate, so often as he has, that these gentlemen only act in an advisory capacity, for that is granted. We all know, and there is no need of repeating it, that their capacity is only advisory. However, I again repeat that section 3, beginning line 26, says:

That this section shall not be construed to prevent any such agent or employee of the Government, or any person acting in an advisory capacity, from rendering services and advice on any matter not connected with such purchase of supplies

And I claim that that prevents them from acting even in an advisory capacity in connection with what is the main controversy now in every case—purchase and contract.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me see if I understand the situation correctly. This advisory commission or board is made up of gentlemen having expert knowledge in the several great industries in the country, and especially in our steel industries, our coal industries, and in transportation facilities. Now, we will suppose that the Government desires to know whether steel can be furnished for, say, $50 or $60 or $80 or $90 a ton. There is an offer made to furnish the steel necessary for the use of the Government at $90 per ton, and the Government makes inquiry. It necessarily would make inquiry from some one upon that commission who has knowledge of the subject. The inquiry is made, and some one who represents and whose business is the steel business informs the Government that such a price would be excessively high and advises the Government against the acceptance of a bid based upon steel at that price. Then, if the same person proffers on his part, and the Government accepts, a bid to take steel at $56 a ton, he has committed a crime under this section, and his company is forbidden to enter into any contract. The very advice, it seems to me, makes him guilty of an offense. Am I mistaken in that respect? If so, wherein am I in error?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is possible that the Senator's construction of the language is correct, but I do not place the same construction upon it. It is simply a difference of opinion, as judges will sometimes differ. I do not believe such persons would come within this section unless they exercised powers and did things which they are not entitled to do.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the principal difficulty that I have in construing this section is that I think the proper construction of it goes even further than the proponents of the section designed, and it goes to an extent that seems to me to be almost ridiculous. Now, let us read the section, without the superfluous words. The section proceeds to declare something unlawful. What is it?

It shall be unlawful for any person acting as a volunteer—

I use the word volunteer; that will carry the thought just as well as if I had quoted the other words in the section—

It shall be unlawful for any person acting as a volunteer in any capacity, including an advisory capacity—

So, therefore, it is unlawful for anybody acting in any capacity as an adviser to the Government to do what?—

to procure, attempt to procure, or make any contract for the purchase of supplies from himself or from any concern in which he is interested.

What bothers me about it is this: A might be called in to advise the Government in respect to the purchase of wheat. If he is, he comes within the first three lines of this section, because he is occupying an advisory relation to the Government in the capacity of suggesting proper methods or prices, as the case may be, for the purchase of wheat. If he is called in to advise in regard to wheat, he is prohibited from making any contract for himself or for any firm in which he is interested for the sale of any goods—not wheat alone—to the Government. He might be in the lumber business, and the Government might not consult him about lumber at all. He might be in the iron business or steel business or the glass business; but, if he stands in the relation of an adviser to the Government in any capacity or in respect to anything, he is prohibited from selling any other thing to the Government, whether he has advised about it or not. That is the difficulty I see with the language of this section.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, is the Senator from Oregon insistent on voting on this paragraph this afternoon? Would it not be well for him to confer with a few of the Senators who have objected and ascertain whether he can not get this paragraph more carefully worded? I do not disagree at all with the purpose the Senator has in mind, and I do not think he disagrees with my suggestion that the volunteer should be protected in a strictly advisory capacity. We certainly can get this matter arranged by to-morrow morning in a way that will suit both parties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course, under the rules of the Senate, Senators can talk about anything they want to, but this is not the pending amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I understood the Senate was about to vote on it. I was misinformed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment on page 16.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I am going to ask to withdraw the amendment on page 16. There seems to be quite a misunderstanding amongst Senators and amongst the members of the committee about it; and, if there is no objection to my withdrawing that amendment, then the pending amendment will be the one we have been discussing this afternoon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment on page 16 is withdrawn.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the acting chairman of the committee if we can not now have a vote as between this bill and what is commonly known as the Gore substitute? If the Gore proposition is substituted and there is anything then to be done to that, we could perfect it; but I see no use in going on, spending a lot of time on this bill, and then bringing in a substitute for it, after all the work has been done on this bill. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that the pending amendment has been withdrawn by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was not the amendment, however, I will say to the Senator, that we have been discussing.

Mr. REED. We have been discussing another amendment, but there is no amendment now pending.

Mr. GORE. Is there no pending amendment to the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, Mr. President. The amendment that is pending is the one we have been discussing this afternoon, the one on page 16 having been withdrawn. So there is a pending amendment.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that it occurs to me that the best course would be to perfect the Gore amendment first, and see whether we can whip it into such shape that we would want to vote on it as a substitute. Let it be perfected before the vote is finally taken. If we take a vote on the Gore amendment in its present condition, we might not want to vote for it; but if it be perfected we might want to vote for it.

Mr. REED. Of course, if the Gore amendment is moved as a substitute, it will then be open to amendment. We can then proceed to amend it, and then the question will come whether it will be substituted.

Mr. WATSON. But, after all, it occurs to me that we will not get the full strength of the vote on the substitute unless we first perfect it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not want to be constantly interjecting, but there is a very plain rule about this matter. The so-called Gore amendment is a motion to strike out and insert. Under Rule XVI, if there are two separate questions, the part to be stricken out is subject to amendment and must be first perfected, and then the part to be inserted is subject to amendment and to be perfected. After the bill as it is now before the Senate has been perfected to the satisfaction of the Senate, and after the so-called Gore amendment has been perfected to the satisfaction of the Senate, then, and only then, under the rules of the Senate, can the vote be taken as to whether the Gore amendment shall take the place of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to suggest that, under the order the Senate has made, we must dispose of the committee amendments before any other amendment is in order. I suggest to the Senator having the bill in charge that we proceed to dispose of all the committee amendments, and then the amendment of the Senator from Oklohoma will be in order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will be delighted to do that, and I have tried to do that; but the Senator knows that under the rules of the Senate a Senator can speak about anything on any amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There does not seem to be anyone who desires to speak on the pending amendment, so let us vote on it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senate will adopt the pending amendment.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not had time to study section 3 as carefully as I should like to do; but I am disposed to think that the construction which is placed upon it by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is correct. If so, it is going to interfere very materially with the work in connection with the prosecution of the war. I realize, as all Senators must realize, that, as a general proposition, it is very unwise to have anyone in any position of responsibility where he may have a dual duty to perform. I realize that it is very necessary that we have the advice and counsel of the great experts who have been brought here, most of whom, I believe, if not all, are acting in a very patriotic way.

At the same time, I have heard so much of the human element in connection with some of the supplies which people at large are getting from producers that I do not think we should leave the Government entirely unprotected against the possibility of error that might be committed by members of this advisory council, willfully or otherwise. I have a substitute for section 3 which I desire to submit to the Senate for its consideration. I desire to call attention especially to its two principal provisions, and then, with that brief explanation, I am going to ask that the Secretary be permitted to read it to the Senate. First, it provides that "No person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the United States in any capacity, including an advisory capacity, shall advise, induce, or attempt to induce any person or officer authorized to execute or to direct the execution of contracts to make any contract in which he may be interested." And, in the second place, if he sits on any board which is considering a given subject, he must be compelled to disclose any financial interest that he may have in the subject matter that is under consideration. I believe that, with this information, we would reduce to a minimum the possibility of any wrong being done the Government. I send the amendment to the desk, and ask that the Secretary may read it. It is a substitute for the entire section 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for section 3, as reported by the committee, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 3. That no person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the United States in any capacity, including an advisory capacity, shall advise, induce, or attempt to induce any person or officer authorized to execute or to direct the execution of contracts on behalf of the United States, to make any contract, or to give any order for the furnishing to the United States of work, labor, or services, or of materials, supplies, or other property of any kind or character, if such agent or employee has any pecuniary interest in such contract or order, or if he or any firm of which he is a member, or corporation, joint stock company, or association of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in the pecuniary profits of which he is directly or indirectly interested, shall be a party thereto. Nor shall any agent or employee make, or be a member of any committee or other body which shall make any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States, or any member or subordinate thereof, without making, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a full and complete disclosure in writing to such persons or group of persons of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and in any party thereto. Any willful violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the difficulty of adjusting this matter arises out of the fact that none of us as yet has a clear understanding of the operations of the advisory commission and of the subcommittees appointed by the Council of National Defense.

Undoubtedly this amendment is intended to prevent the men who have been in Washington serving on these committees from being interested in any contract made with the Government, in which they have participated, whether their capacity was simply advisory or not.

Now, Mr. President, I assume that Congress acted wisely when it authorized the organization of the Council of National Defense and the advisory commission. I assume that their purpose was to bring about the coordination and cooperation of the department chiefs—six in number—who have the most to do with the prosecution of the war, or the largest identification with the industrial interests upon which we must rely for the prosecution of the war. I assume also that Congress knew what it was doing when it authorized the organization of an advisory commission, and that it knew that the purpose was to mobilize all the industries with which the Government had to deal by contract, in such a way as to have those industries represented at Washington upon authorized committees, with all the information and expert knowledge which they have to present to the National Government.

Now, I assume that is the purpose of Congress. What evidence have we that the purpose of Congress has been in any way perverted?

I regret, Mr. President, that the Council of National Defense has not kept Congress better informed as to its movements and action; but I imagine that Congress will not hold it to too strict a responsibility regarding reports which were not required by our legislation, in view of the fact that each one of these department chiefs is under tremendous pressure, forced every moment to do the present thing, and for this reason lacking the time to make elaborate reports of what is done or what is contemplated.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption there?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I think one reason why they have not reported is that delay and indecision have chiefly characterized their proceedings.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not believe that delay and indecision have characterized their proceedings. I think their accomplishment thus far is a great one. They have put into operation the machinery of legislation for the creation of a vast army. They have organized and landed upon the shores of France without a mishap a very large force. They have been engaged daily in conference with these various committees making a survey of the resources of the country upon which the Nation must call. They have not made contracts regarding the most important matters, perhaps—steel and iron and coal, lying at the base of all other industries—because as yet they have not been able to agree upon a price; but the machinery which they have adopted for the determination of price seems to me an admirable one.

In the first place, they have summoned to Washington upon these committees the chiefs of industry, the captains of industry, in each department. Can they exhaust inquiry in a day? Can they secure all the information necessary in a day? No; and they would be powerless to do it themselves in as efficient a manner as through the aid of these great captains of industry, who are able to present to them in the clearest and most concise form the condition of every industry, the location of the plants, the output of the plants, the possibilities of increasing the plants, and their coordination in such a way as to get from each plant as quickly as possible its largest output in the interest of the war. Having summoned these men here to give information, having summoned these men who are frankly sellers to give that information, and that expert information, there is nothing in the record to show that they blindly follow the advice or the information which they receive from these interested parties.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to ask him a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. The Council of National Defense consists altogether of members of the Cabinet?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. The advisory commission consists altogether of civilians who are not members of the Council of National Defense?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. All that the advisory commission can do is to advise as to prices and materials and such other matters as may be of interest. Is it not a fact that the Council of National Defense, consisting of Cabinet members, making no contracts as a body but making contracts only as individuals afterwards, can protect the Government and the Treasury from any foolish advice or selfish advice that might be given by the advisory commission altogether outside of any official capacity?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Why, of course. They represent the Government, the buyer. They are the agents of the Government for the purpose of buying; and the Council of National Defense does not act as a unit in determining whether a contract shall be let. That responsibility attaches to the chief of the department to which the jurisdiction properly belongs.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CALDER. Is it not also a fact that these associate committees of the advisory commission were appointed solely for the purpose of coordinating their respective trades; and after all, do they not represent these trades in their relation to the Government rather than the Government?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly. They represent the industries; they represent the sellers. Now, it is not to be assumed that they act without interest. Of course they are interested in these industries. Everybody understands that; but their information and their advice is at hand, to be taken and accepted by the Council of National Defense, or by the department or chief charged with the responsibility, as they or he shall determine.

Now, what do we propose to do? In an atmosphere of suspicion and distrust, not warranted by a single thing that has been presented to our attention, not warranted by a single proven charge, we propose to penalize the members of these committees of sellers and say, "You can give your information, you can give your advice, but you can not take a contract, nor can any concern in which you are interested take a contract."

What do you do, then, with reference to the steel interests? Why, you prevent these captains in the steel industry from acting on the committee at all, and you go to men of less experience and less information for that which the Government seeks.

Where is there any evidence that the Government has suffered? Do not the Council of National Defense know that they are dealing with sellers? Does not each department chief know that he is dealing with a seller? Mr. Gary is chairman of one of the subcommittees regarding steel. When the Council of National Defense ask him whether the condition of the steel industry is such as will enable the Government to receive a prompt response to a demand for 1,000 or 10,000 or 1,000,000 tons of steel, do they not know that he is an interested party, and do they not go to him simply because he is an interested party and knows and understands the industry? But you propose to penalize that man and other men like him.

To whom would you go for information with regard to the steel industry of this country in preference to Mr. Gary and Mr. Schwab? We know that these two men have all the information at their disposal. Are you going to have the Council of National Defense take mere theorists and experts and send them all over the country to make inquiry, when the information can be collected and presented to them quickly and almost instantaneously by the parties interested in the industry? And, knowing that they are interested, will they not be on their guard with reference to the price?

What do we witness to-day? We know that the steel industry has mobilized itself with a view to meeting the demands of the Government. They know what plants can be enlarged, how their output can be enlarged; and, mind you, it will be necessary to enlarge outputs and to make large expenditures in plants. Are you going to prevent the corporations in which they are interested from having any contract with the Government? And right here to-day, what evidence have you of lack of careful methods of procedure upon the part of the Council of National Defense? Have they accepted the price per ton which the Steel Trust and the other plants insist upon as a fair price, a price which they can receive elsewhere in the market? Not at all. The Federal Trade Commission, under the direction of the President, is now engaged in a careful inquiry as to costs. I have gone over some of that work with members of that commission, and I can see how careful and studious their attention to that job has been. We have in the papers an illustration of the care with which the administration is proceeding in this matter—an absolute refusal upon the part of the President and upon the part of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to accept the price which is presented by this industry as a fair price, and an indication that rather than accept that price the Government will resort to the extraordinary power, given by the law, of commandeering their plants.

Mr. President, I hope there will be some adjustment of that matter. I hope there will be some adjustment of that matter through the Federal Trade Commission after they have ascertained their costs. I trust there will be such a settlement of it as will give the steel industry a fair profit and as will also stimulate the steel industry to enlarge its plants. We all know that there must be some stimulus. If they shall enlarge the plants at the expense of tens of millions of dollars, and the war should come to an end this week or next month or next year, those plants might be idle. So that there are two things to be considered. These men, representing the stockholders, must see to it that there is a sufficient guaranty for the future if they are to increase their capital expenditure; and the Government, on the other hand, is warranted in fixing such a price as will stimulate them to increase their plants and to produce the products that are essential for the prosecution of the war.

So it was with coal. Was there any indication there of yielding to the views of the sellers? Protracted negotiations were held upon that subject between the Council of National Defense and the committee headed by Mr. Peabody, representing the coal interests, frankly buyers on the one side and sellers upon the other; and the result of it all was that the operators of the entire country were summoned to Washington by Mr. Peabody's committee, and a conference was held, and action was taken by the operators, but none by the Government.

There seems to be an assumption that the Government accepted the price of $3 a ton at the mine fixed by the coal operators. That is not so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. The coal operators fixed a price of $3, whereas the prevailing price at the mine a little over a year ago, before the war and perhaps during the war, was only $1.50 a ton. We insist that it is too high, and I think it is too high; but, on the other hand, the operators say that as a result of the extraordinary demand upon the coal production of the country it has risen in the market to $5.50 a ton, and that in making a reduction from $5.50 a ton to $3 a ton they made a patriotic sacrifice——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Just one moment, if the Senator will allow me to complete this thought.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There the operators came down from $5.50 to $3 a ton, and every factory in the country has received the benefit of that; but was it accepted by the Government? No. That matter is to be left still as a matter of investigation and inquiry. The War Department and the Navy Department have announced that they regard the price as too high. The President has declared that there shall be no relationship between profits and patriotism. What indication is there, therefore, that the sellers on these various committees are having undue influence with the Government?

Mr. President, it is a hard thing for any man to vote against an amendment which penalizes the participation in a contract with the Government of any agent of the Government, whether he be under salary or simply advisory. It is a hard thing to vote against it; and yet if you do put this upon the statute book, you impair and destroy this system of coordination which has been built up; that system which has given Germany preeminence in the industrial world—the ability to mobilize its industries, accurate knowledge concerning them, accurate knowledge regarding present production and future possibilities of production, and accurate knowledge regarding costs and prices. You are going to take a step backward in the pathway of efficiency; and we all know that the great evil of democracies is that they can not or do not act with the accuracy and the efficiency with which autocracies act.

We have been headed in the right direction. This work of the administration regarding war has been done and well done; and it does not seem to me that in advance, relying simply upon suspicion, without proof of any wrongdoing, and, on the contrary, with proof of the guarded care with which the administration and the Council of National Defense are acting, we should practically destroy this system of cooperation and coordination that has been built up.

I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if he thinks the members of the advisory commission or the members of the advisory committees should have the right to procure, attempt to procure, or make any contract for the purchase of any supplies for the use of the Government, either from themselves or from their firms, or from corporations in which they are interested? Does the Senator think they ought to have the right to contract with themselves, as stated in this section?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me read the language.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that that is all there is in the proposed statute—"procure, attempt to procure, or make any contract" for the benefit of themselves. Does the Senator think they ought to have the right to do it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Why, I think that the coal operators are there, I think the steel operators are there, frankly to sell to the Government and to procure contracts with the Government, and they ought to be there.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the Senator thinks they ought to be there?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not regard them in any sense as the agents of the Government. I regard this simply as a scheme of legislation by which the great industries of the country can, through responsible men, deal with the Government; that on the one hand they are the sellers—frankly so—and that on the other hand the Government is the buyer.

Why, we have to-day this committee on transportation, composed of five of the most prominent railroad presidents in the country; men not at all connected with scandals in railway administration; men of high character and efficiency.

They are here every day, at the invitation of the Government, conferring with the Council of National Defense as to the methods in which they can best serve the Government; and yet they are carrying goods for the Government, and they are pecuniarily interested in every operation of the Government. Would you deny the Government the aid and the cooperation of such a committee by declaring that no corporation in which they are interested should transport a ton of coal for the United States Government?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I just want to call the attention of the Senator to this language. It reads:

To procure, attempt to procure—

And so forth.

Why, what is Mr. Gary here for to-day? Of course, I imagine, though I do not know, that the position of the Steel Trust and of Mr. Schwab's organization is that there is such an extraordinary demand for steel throughout the world that they can command the present prices of over $100 a ton. But the Government desires to get a lower price out of them. Now, after they have secured a lower price, would you penalize Mr. Gary for having participated in making that contract, when the Steel Trust and Mr. Schwab's plant are practically the only plants in the country that are able to respond to the demands of the Government?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator if he thinks that the fact that Mr. Gary did participate in that conference will lead to the Government getting the steel any cheaper than if he had not come there?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, I hope so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does not the Senator think that Mr. Gary's influence there will be to raise the price of steel to the Government?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I hope the result of that conference will be to bring down the price of steel very materially.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I said to raise the price of steel to the Government. Will not that be the result of Mr. Gary's participation in this conference? Of course we understand that all the influence that he brought to bear upon his confrères in that meeting was to increase the price of steel to the Government and put money in the coffers of the company he represents.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I presume that Mr. Gary or Mr. Schwab should not talk to the Council of National Defense at all; that they should not talk to the Secretary of War; that they should not talk to the Secretary of the Navy. It is a dangerous thing for them, inasmuch as they are interested in a production part of which the Government will need, to approach the President or the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, lest they be unduly influenced. I can not admit the force of that argument.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If the representatives of these great steel companies are to be called into council with the Government, is it the Senator's idea that they will tell the Government what is a correct price?

Mr. NEWLANDS. My idea is that in all probability self-interest will prompt them to name a price above that which they should receive. I think so.

Mr. REED. I was asking if they were to advise with regard to prices. Now, of what use or value is the advice of a man who, as the Senator has just said, is so circumstanced that self-interest would cause him to name a price above that which he ought to receive? Do not those two statements together prove absolutely the utter foolishness of calling in the men who are concerned in the prices to consult with them about prices? Does it not follow that the kind of consultation that ought to be had with these gentlemen is with reference to the capacity of plants, the ability to produce things—that sort of information which they can give without interfering with their own business?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator's argument would, of course, prevent all communication between buyer and seller. In the usual vocations every buyer must beware in talking to a seller of a thing that he wants lest that seller should advise him unwisely.

Mr. REED. No; Mr. President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator's argument does away with all negotiations between buyer and seller.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is how I regard this. The Senator talks about advice. I regard this simply as negotiation between the great industries of the country and the Government—the seller prompted by self-interest, restrained perhaps by patriotism, and the buyer appealing to the sense of fairness and patriotism of the seller. I do not know how you can get a price except by negotiation, unless you resort to public bids; and we all know that with reference to all these things that are now in such urgent demand by the Government, if the Government should seek bids, the prices fixed would be exorbitant.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the amendment that has just been read from the desk, proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and ask him if he does not believe that that is a real solution of this whole difficulty, and one that will not result in the demobilization of the brains and the success of the country in an enterprise where the highest intelligence is required and where we must succeed? As I understood the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, it would carry these two propositions, which I think ought to meet the situation: First, that no one who has a relation of trust or confidence with the Government, even in an advisory capacity, shall be permitted to solicit a contract with the Government in which he is interested, or in which any institution in which he has a financial interest is interested. That is absolutely prohibited and made a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment.

But if he occupies any such relation to the Government on the board, and the board desires to award a contract to him or to an institution in which he has a pecuniary interest, he is compelled to disclose in writing what that interest is. So it will be dealing at arms length. The other members of the committee or board, or whatever the constituent body may be, have acted upon the knowledge of his disclosure as to the extent of his interest, but with the additional thought that he must withdraw from any participation in the award. So you have a situation that precludes the possibility, except subject to the penalties of the statute, of anybody sustaining this relation to the Government soliciting a contract, or if the exigencies of the situation require that the contract should be let to him or to some institution in which he has an interest, he must not only withdraw from any participation in the award of the contract but must disclose in writing that interest, so that it will be a matter of record.

I think if we would adopt the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and I think I have correctly stated it, it would be an easy solution of this whole difficulty, because I believe, Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will indulge me just a moment longer, that nothing would bring more joy to the heart of the German Kaiser than that we should demobilize this wonderful instrument that has been gathered together and that represents the best brains and the greatest success of this country. Although I have striven over in court many and many a time for the rule of law which has been invoked, a rule of law that is designed to protect the weak against the strong, the ward against the guardian, the cestin que trust against his trustee, I do not think that we can stand upon that principle of existing law in our dealings with a great government's resources and the mobilization of them for the purposes of a vast war. Yet I am in sympathy with appeasing what I might be justified in saying is almost a popular demand, that some sort of protection must be thrown around these contracts, so that if it accomplishes nothing else it will banish the idea of any suspicion or any irregularity in the conduct of the war in the mobilization of our materials and our supplies.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio and explained by the Senator from Pennsylvania is preferable to the amendment which we have been considering, but I am still doubtful about the language employed. I want to penalize a Member of Congress who has an interest in a contract with reference to which he is legislating; I want to penalize a member of the Cabinet who has an interest in a contract which he makes on behalf of the Government; but I am reluctant to penalize the seller because of his interest and because he may in an interview with the buyer have either urged or advised that his offer be accepted.

Mr. KNOX. That is not the language of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as I recall it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand; it is "to solicit." I want every producer in this country to be soliciting contracts for the Government. The more men engaged in the steel industry who will come forward and be solicitous to get contracts with the Government, the better for the Government and the better for the prosecution of this war. I want such men to solicit contracts. I want the executive department and Congress to be upon their guard and to realize all the time that we are dealing with sellers and that they represent the buyers.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to continue this thought, I will yield to him in a moment. I think the evil comes largely from the term "advisory." It is an unfortunate term, because it implies possibly that the people who are called upon to advise are absolutely disinterested people, when in the very nature of things they can not be disinterested.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio makes it a penal offense for a man on this committee like Mr. Gary to solicit a contract. I want him to solicit a contract and I wish him to be very eager to get a contract for the Government, and I trust patriotism will be as effective as self-interest in indicating the terms of that contract. I will now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania, if he desires.

Mr. KNOX. I only wish to state that I hardly believe the Senator from Nevada intends to have us understand that he wants Mr. Gary, to use his own illustration, to solicit a contract which Mr. Gary himself will be one of the parties to award.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not understand that Mr. Gary has anything to do with the awarding of the contract.

Mr. KNOX. Then the amendment of the Senator from Ohio would not cover the situation the Senator from Nevada has suggested. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as I understand it, and I think I do understand it, is intended to prevent members of boards that have anything to do with the awarding of contracts or the advising of the awarding of contracts from soliciting the boards of which they are members to give themselves the contract. That is the idea, as I understand it. Now, that does no harm to Mr. Gary. The fact is—and I think no one knows it better than the Senator from Nevada, the solicitation is going to be the other way. The Government is going to solicit the material; the manufacturers will not have to solicit the Government in order to sell it to them. For instance, take ship plate. Suppose the Government wants 10,000 or 100,000 or 500,000 tons of ship plate. The Government knows who makes ship plate, and the Government will, under this law, even though Mr. Gary should be on the advisory board in respect to the character of the plate that should be used, would not put Mr. Gary in the position of having him come to them and solicit the board to buy plate.

If the board would go to Mr. Gary and solicit a bid upon plate, then if Mr. Gary was a member of the board he would come under the provision of the second paragraph of the amendment—that is, he would have to disclose his interest and retire from any participation in the award. Now, that is not a hardship upon anybody and it seems to me it is morally correct, and still will not interfere with the administration of the contract at all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have great confidence in the judgment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and it may be upon reading the amendment over I may find it satisfactory, but as the Senator quoted from it, I understand it to be made a penal offense for one of these captains of industry representing his industry, on one of these committees of producers and sellers, to solicit a contract.

Now, what does soliciting mean? Any effort to make a contract is a solicitation. I do not want to hedge these men around with penalizations that will prevent them from rushing to the aid of the Government and from offering their plants and their products to the Government and naming the price. If such an offer as that is to be regarded as soliciting and then these captains of industry are to be indicted for a penal offense because they have offered it, it seems to me the legislation is not so worded as to meet the purpose of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WADSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] had risen to make a suggestion to me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply wish to make one suggestion to the Senator from Nevada. It seems to me that he has overlooked the purpose of this amendment. I am quite clear, first, that we all want to protect the Government. We do want the advice and counsel of all these great experts. The Government ought to have the benefit of that. At the same time the Government ought to be in a position where it will not be criticized. It seems to me if I were a member of this advisory council I would want, nay, I would demand some legislation which would put me in a position while I was trying to serve my country where I would be above suspicion. For that reason if one of these men who is acting on the advisory council is himself a manufacturer or a dealer in war supplies which the Government wants, he could very readily disclose to his associates on the advisory council that, "I am interested to this extent: I am manufacturing this class of goods. I want the Government to have these goods if the Government wants them, but you must be the judge as to whether or not the Government is to have them, and ought to have them, from my company." I think that is going to be a protection not only to the members of the advisory council so that they will not be subjected to criticism but it will be also a protection to the Government itself against scandal and against excessive charges.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, just one word. I have not the Senator's amendment before me and I have not been able to read it. I only have the information which I secured from the Senator from Pennsylvania. I wish to ask the Senator to what does the term "solicit" refer in his amendment?

Mr. POMERENE. The language is "solicit, attempt to procure, or procure"; that is, he must not be the active agent, in going to the War Department and saying, "I want you to get so many plates of steel from the United States Steel Co." He must not do that. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, when several days ago I took it upon myself to raise an objection to a request for unanimous consent that the bill now pending before the Senate should be voted upon, I had in mind the very suggestion that has been described so ably this afternoon with respect to section 3 of the bill. I think upon that occasion when I gave my reason for objecting to the unanimous-consent agreement which was then being proposed by the Senator from Oregon I stated we were in danger, by the enactment of section 3, of upsetting the entire war-making machinery of the United States. I think several Senators have come to the same conclusion, although perhaps not all who have come to that conclusion have as yet reached a solution for the redrafting of this section.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has described the functions in part, I may say, of the advisory commission, or the subcommittees of the advisory commission, of the Council of National Defense. He has laid particular stress upon the fact that they are committees of sellers. I think that does not tell the whole story. They do a good deal more than to offer to sell goods to the Government of the United States.

I have in mind, Mr. President, the aircraft-production board, concerning whose activities I have been fortunate enough to receive just a little information during the last few days.

Every Senator, I think, realizes the tremendous part that aviation plays in the war that is now going on, and a good many of us believe that Americans can do nothing more effective to bring it to an early close than to establish absolute supremacy in the air, on the part of the allies and ourselves, over the German aircraft.

The aircraft-production board is one of the committees of the advisory commission. It is headed by Mr. Howard E. Coffin, who, as is generally known, is vice president of the Hudson Motor Car Co. Another member is the chief signal officer of the Army, Gen. George O. Squier; another, Rear Admiral David W. Taylor, of the Bureau of Construction of the Navy. Then there are Mr. S. D. Waldron, ex-vice president of the Packard Motor Car Co.; Mr. E. A. Deeds, former general manager of the National Cash Register Co. and later with the Dayton Engineering Co.; and Mr. R. L. Montgomery, senior member of Montgomery, Clothier & Taylor.

Mr. President, this aircraft-production board is doing something infinitely more important than offering goods for sale to the Government of the United States. It has been at work since the outbreak of the war endeavoring to place the industries of this country in a position where they can turn out fighting aeroplanes in such enormous quantities that once they take the air nothing within a distance of 50 miles, measuring back from the German lines, will be safe against attack by the aeroplanes of the allies.

When the war broke out, although we had been making aeroplanes in this country for a long time, in fact, longer than any other country, the development in aeroplane manufacture was exceedingly small as compared with the development in Germany, France, and England, and smaller even than the development in Italy, and it became necessary to mobilize all the industries that could turn to good account their present facilities in the manufacture of aeroplanes and particularly of aero motors.

This aircraft production board has not only consulted with all the designers of motors in the United States, all the men with any experience or reputation, but it has consulted with French, British, and Italian designers. Experts from all those countries have come here on the invitation of this board to submit the latest designs of the French, British, and Italian machines, and particularly the motors which propel those machines.

An effort has been made by this aircraft board, upon which the Army and the Navy are represented, but which is under the leadership of Mr. Coffin, to get the very best in designs and materials and information from all our allies, who have had such tremendously valuable experience for nearly three years in operating fighting machines.

I am informed that some of the experts from abroad give it as their opinion that it would require six months for the designers and the manufacturers of the United States to design and adopt and get into the course of manufacture an aeroplane motor which would be comparable with the motors used in the French, Italian, and British services. Apparently the American designers who were called to Washington to give the Government advice upon this matter believed that that period could be reduced. They invited a score or more of the most eminent motor designers in the United States to put their heads together, and after carefully examining all the best designs in the foreign countries to put together an American motor. As the result of the mobilization of the brains of the motor-building industry in the United States I am informed that the first motor will be manufactured within 30 days from the day on which the work started. Mr. President, it would have been utterly impossible for the Secretary of War or the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, or any officer of the Navy, no matter how highly educated in technical work, to have accomplished that result. It required the combined brains of the motor-manufacturing industry of the United States under the leadership and instruction and advice of the head of the aircraft-production board and his civilian colleagues on that board.

Mr. President, it is the publicly announced policy of the administration to embark upon the manufacture of airplanes in the United States upon a tremendous scale.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator will pardon me, I think it might be pertinent to remark at this place that the standardized motor is not the motor of the Packard Co. or of the Hudson Co.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All the designers who were gathered together under the leadership of this aircraft-production board of course have had experience in different motor-car companies, and without knowing whether it is true or not, I am under the very deep impression that probably some designer from the Packard Motor Car Co. helped in the work and some designer in the Hudson Motor Car Co. helped in the work.

Mr. WATSON. Supplementary to what the Senator from New York has so ably said, I think that the men who originally designed the standardized motor were Mr. Vincent, from Detroit, and Mr. Hall, from San Francisco.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no knowledge of the names of the gentlemen, but my information is that there were more than two. Perhaps the final designs were perfected by two gentlemen, but it was the combined talent of more than two men, according to the information I have received.

Mr. President, while this designing has been going on, while this great effort has been in progress toward establishing an American motor which shall be the equal or the superior of any foreign motor, and my information is, sir, that is it at least the equal of any foreign motor, this aircraft-production board has not been idle in other directions. One hundred and twenty-five of our best technical experts are now in Europe, keeping in touch with the latest developments from day to day and in constant communication with the aircraft-production board here at home, so that if any improvement should take place abroad our military service will get instant advantage from it. Without question many of the 125, who will from time to time cable advices to our Government, have some interest in some motor-manufacturing company in the United States. Some of the 125 are Reserve Corps officers, having been given military commissions in order to establish their status among the military men of England, France, and Italy.

It is a tremendous organization that has been developed, and is in the course of further development; and it must not stop in its progress toward perfection one single instant if there is any truth in the prediction which we hear made so often, that airplanes may settle this war.

Now, Mr. President, no one motor factory can turn out this standardized perfected American motor economically and with sufficient speed to suit or to meet the military needs of the situation. So, according to my information, this aircraft-production board has estimated the manufacturing facilities of every concern in the United States that can make any little part of it, and has arranged to have different parts made in a score or more of factories, some of them as far distant as the Pacific coast. Some of them are not motor factories at all, but are shops that can quickly and easily turn their efforts into making some little part of this motor.

It is exceedingly probable that one or more of the civilian members of this aircraft-production board is a stockholder in some one or more of the score or more of concerns that are going to make parts for this motor. Now, what may happen under the amendment now pending? The aircraft-production board does not make the contract for these motors or any of their parts. I assume that only the Secretary of War may make the contract, but there never has been a Secretary of War and there never will be a Secretary of War who will know all about this entire problem. So the aircraft-production board, I assume, will go to the Secretary of War and describe the progress that has been made, the scheme and plan that has been laid out, what has already been accomplished, and advise him that by having such and such a manufacturer make one certain part of the machine and another manufacturer make another certain part of the machine at certain prices which they think are reasonably fair, the whole work can be coordinated and brought to a successful conclusion in the shortest possible time. But if the aircraft-production board does that, under the existing amendment three of them, if it is assumed that any of these three men own any stock in any of these companies, commit a criminal offense for merely advising the Secretary of War to sign a contract with a score or more of companies that are to put together this motor.

Mr. REED. The Senator is now referring to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio or the amendment that was reported?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am referring primarily to the original amendment pending before the Senate. I have not seen a printed copy of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and I am not entirely certain——

Mr. POMERENE. I may say that it has not been printed. It was simply offered to-day.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not seen a typewritten copy or a written copy. I am not entirely certain that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is absolutely safe in respect to the situation I am attempting to describe.

Mr. POMERENE. I think if the Senator has an opportunity he will conclude that it will not at all interfere with his views in the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If that is true, of course I am greatly relieved.

Mr. POMERENE. Very briefly stated, it involves two propositions: First, that no man shall solicit or procure or attempt to procure a contract if he is interested in it—that is, he shall not actively solicit nor attempt to procure or procure it—and, secondly, if the commission or the advisory council of which he is a member should seek to procure or contract for any of these supplies, that then he should disclose any pecuniary interest or official or stockholding interest which he may have in the company that is about to furnish the supplies; and that he shall not participate in the making of the contract. I think it might be well, Mr. President, to have the amendment read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am in entire agreement with the contention of the Senator from Ohio—that the pecuniary interest which any one of these gentlemen may have in any article which is to be purchased by the Government shall be made a matter of the greatest publicity. I think, if you do that, you would not need to do anything else. The situation is then cured by the weapon with which we are all familiar—"pitiless publicity." If the Government itself knows and the public knows and Congress knows that John Smith, a member of some subcommittee of the advisory commission of the National Council of Defense, owns so many shares of stock in such and such a corporation which is about to sell some of its goods to the Government, following the advice of the committee of which John Smith is a member—if the public knows that, we will not have to have any additional provisions of law to protect the Government against fraud. Furthermore, be it remembered, Mr. President, it is not these committees that make contracts; it is the head of the department, the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy. And it is to be presumed that they are exceedingly anxious to protect the Government against extortionate prices. As I read the amendment, however—even the amendment of the Senator from Ohio—if three civilian members of the aircraft production board, accompanied by the two military members, desire to discuss with the Secretary of War a series of contracts, and if it so happens that they are interested in any one of many companies whose facilities are to be used in the manufacture of the goods, they are debarred from taking part in any such discussion and must not participate in making the contract.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I do not think that is really what the amendment means. Was the Senator from New York present when we discussed it a few minutes ago?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and I tried to understand it.

Mr. KNOX. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Ohio—and, of course, it is upon that understanding that I gave it my acquiesence—it is designed to accomplish two things. One is that the members of these advisory boards shall be prohibited from soliciting contracts for their own benefit. I do not believe that that is objectionable, although I can understand from the example that the Senator from New York just put that there might be a very remote interest to be affected; but, speaking of it as a practical thing, I do not believe that is objectionable. I do not think a self-respecting man would, if he were occupying a confidential relation with the Government, solicit in the sense that he would seek to get a contract over and above some one else.

The other provision, as I understand, is this: If he is a member of the board, and if the board decides that the contract should for the best interest of the Government be given to a concern in which he is interested, then he ought to disclose his interest in that concern.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I believe in that thoroughly.

Mr. KNOX. Then I think the Senator from New York, the Senator from Ohio, and myself are almost in accord about the need of some such amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My only dread was that a member of the board who was in the category which the Senator from Pennsylvania has been describing would be debarred by something we do here from advising with the department chief.

Mr. KNOX. I do not understand that this amendment would do that at all. I should like to have the amendment again read.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to say that in the amendment as originally drawn the word "advise" was inserted, and the amendment was read with that word in it. Since then I have made several modifications of the amendment; and in order to perfect the amendment I now ask the consent of the Senate that I may strike out the word "advise" and substitute therefor the word "solicit."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has a right to modify the amendment which has been tendered by him.

Mr. POMERENE. Again, after the words "or other body which shall make," I desire to insert the words "or participate in making"; again, to insert, after the phrase "which he may have in such contract or order and in any party thereto," the words "nor shall he participate in making such contract or giving said order." I ask to modify the amendment in those respects; and I now ask the Secretary to read it to the Senate as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for that purpose; and I shall conclude in just a moment

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3. No person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the United States in any capacity, including an advisory capacity, shall solicit, induce, or attempt to induce any person or officer authorized to execute or to direct the execution of contracts on behalf of the United States to make any contract or to give any order for the furnishing to the United States of work, labor, or services, or of materials, supplies, or other property of any kind or character, if such agent or employee has any pecuniary interest in such contract or order, or if he or any firm of which he is a member, or corporation, joint-stock company, or association of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in the pecuniary profits of which he is directly or indirectly interested, shall be a party thereto. Nor shall any agent or employee make or be a member of any committee or other body which shall make or participate in making any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States, or any member or subordinate thereof, without making to the best of his knowledge and belief a full and complete disclosure in writing to such persons or group of persons of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and in any party thereto, nor shall he participate in making such contract or giving said order. Any willful violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, just one or two observations, and I shall take my seat. Let me say that the amendment as now prepared and proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] meets my views on this question, and is infinitely preferable to the amendment which is printed in the bill as reported by the committee. Mr. President, let me take this opportunity to make another observation. It is exceedingly unfortunate, in my humble judgment, that the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives have so little opportunity to become informed as to what the administration is doing, and particularly what the Council of National Defense and the advisory commission are doing.

Time and time again it appears upon this floor and upon the floor of the House of Representatives that the legislative branch is in the dark, and being in the dark it becomes suspicious. Let me observe, Mr. President, that it would be a helpful thing if the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense and the officers of the Council of National Defense itself would from time to time, upon appropriate occasions, through methods that are proper and feasible, inform Senators, individually or collectively, of what is being accomplished by these extra legal boards and commissions. We would then all understand what was being done; we would not be confused and misled. We would not make mistakes or reach the very verge of making mistakes; for that is what the Senate was doing a short time ago on this very amendment; and there would be a much better feeling, not only between the legislative branch and the executive branch, but amongst all the people of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, so far as I may be permitted to do so, after consultation with some of my colleagues on the committee, I am willing to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio in lieu of section 3 of the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to have the concluding paragraph of the amendment again reported. I did not quite catch the significance of the last words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the last paragraph of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The Secretary read as follows:

Nor shall any agent or employee make, or be a member of any committee or other body which shall make, or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States or any member or subordinate thereof, without making to the best of his knowledge and belief a full and complete disclosure in writing to such persons or group of persons of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and in any party thereto, nor shall he participate in making such contract or giving said order.

Mr. KNOX. Right there, I want to ask the Senator from Ohio if it is not his thought wholly that such persons shall not participate in making the award? If you say that he shall not participate in the making of the contract, it might be said that he could not be a party to the contract; and that would defeat the very purpose of the provision.

Mr. POMERENE. That was not so intended. In the earlier part of the proposed amendment the words are used "make any contract or to give any order," and in the latter part of it I have tried to repeat the same language. It is possible that the amendment ought to be further modified.

Mr. KNOX. I should suggest that it would meet the thought which I understand the Senator from Ohio entertains to merely say "nor shall he vote upon the awarding of such contract." He will have to be a participant in the contract as a party. After he has disclosed his pecuniary interest in the contract there is nothing to prevent him then being a party to the contract, and making a contract.

Mr. POMERENE. Provide that he shall not vote to award this contract to himself. That is the purpose.

Mr. KNOX. That is the idea; and I think that language would cover it.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the Senator of the opinion that the amendment as it is now framed does not include that idea, and that idea only?

Mr. KNOX. I am afraid that it might be argued that it includes something more than that; but I know it is not the Senator's intention that it should do so.

Mr. POMERENE. It is not.

Mr. KNOX. It is only for the purpose of clearness that I would suggest that the language which the Senator has just used would be adequate and sufficient.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator suggest the exact change which he thinks should be made?

Mr. KNOX. I will endeavor to do so in a moment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator pardon me for just a moment?

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if it is his understanding of the law that the members of the advisory commission are now permitted to make contracts or to vote in connection with the making of contracts?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not believe I understand the Senator's question.

Mr. GRONNA. I asked the Senator from Ohio if it is his understanding that under the present law the members of the advisory commission are in any way allowed to vote in connection with the making of contracts, or can make contracts?

Mr. POMERENE. I must answer by saying that I have not examined the present statute on that subject.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator from Oregon made that clear a few moments ago.

Mr. POMERENE. It is quite clear that a Senator or a Cabinet officer might not be interested in a contract, but whether or not the statute is broad enough to include any man acting in an advisory capacity I can not say.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, there is nothing in the law creating the Council of National Defense and its advisory commission to permit them to contract with themselves or anybody else.

Mr. GRONNA. Nor can they accept contracts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The law as it now stands does not prevent them from making contracts, but does not authorize them to make contracts. There is no power given them to make contracts for the Government with themselves or with anybody else.

Mr. GRONNA. My understanding of the law is that they are not authorized to make any contracts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Under the act creating the Council of National Defense they are not authorized to do that.

Mr. GRONNA. That is my understanding.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. POMERENE. In just a moment. The Senator from Pennsylvania has suggested a change in the amendment, and I ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

Nor shall any agent or employee make, or be a member of any committee or other body which shall make or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States or any member or subordinate thereof without making, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a full and complete disclosure in writing to such persons or group of persons of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and in any party thereto; nor shall he participate in the awarding of such contract or giving said order.

Mr. POMERENE. So far as I may, I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has the right to perfect the amendment in that way. Those words will be embodied in the amendment and become a part of the same.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Ohio if he will agree to the insertion of the word "construction" immediately after the word "supplies," so that it will read—make any contract or to give any order for the furnishing to the United States of work, labor, or services, or of materials, supplies, construction, or other property of any kind or character—

And so forth. Will the Senator agree to that?

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is embraced in the words "work" and "labor," but, if not, I have no objection to the word "construction" being inserted. If, however, I may make the suggestion to the Senator, I think he is proposing to insert the word at the wrong place. The word "construction" should apply, not only to materials and supplies, but also to the words "or other property." To say "materials, supplies, or other property of any kind or character, or the construction thereof," it seems to me would be better.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps it would be better to insert the words "including construction," after the word "character." I will ask that that modification be made.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be considered as a part of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in regard to the proposed substitute I desire to say that the first subdivision of it, which is all in one sentence, is absolutely all right, but I think we ought to know just exactly what we are doing when we agree to the second subdivision. In my opinion, by the adoption of the second subdivision we will legalize the practice of members of the advisory commission or its committees dealing with themselves. We will simply put certain limitations upon their dealing with themselves.

I now read the last subdivision of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Nor shall any agent or employee make, or be a member of any committee or other body which shall make or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States or any member or subordinate thereof without making, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a full and complete disclosure in writing to such persons or group of persons of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order.

All these gentlemen will have to do in order to deal with themselves, if we adopt this provision, will be merely to put it in writing that they have an interest.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment. They can go as far as they like, just so they put it in writing. I do not believe that we ought to legislate in that way. We have a provision on the subject now, and it is a better provision than this, which legalizes the very thing that we have been endeavoring to prevent. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator certainly does not want to misstate the situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely not.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator failed to read the last clause which is a very material one, namely, "that he shall not participate in making the award of the contract."

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, listen to this. There can not be any mistake about it——

Mr. GORE. A Cabinet officer makes the award now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; a Cabinet officer makes the award now. There is no doubt in the world now that the advisory commission does not sign contracts. We all know that the officers of the Quartermaster's Department sign the contracts. If we adopt this provision, we will merely be legalizing what we are complaining of. That is all we will be doing. There is no need for any misunderstanding about it. It is very carefully written, very adroitly worded, but the effect of it is beyond the shadow of controversy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the advisory commission makes no contracts, to what does the final provision refer, namely, that no member of it shall vote in making an award?

Mr. McKELLAR. The proposed amendment will permit just what they are doing now. Under this provision they will have that right. A committee of the Council of National Defense, say the committee on clothing, will advise that the Government buy a million suits of clothes from Sears, Roebuck & Co., for the sake of the illustration. They will have a right to do that under this provision, and the contracting officers of the Government may proceed to enter formally into a contract upon that recommendation. That is just precisely what they are doing now. In other words, this is a pure and simple legalization of what we are trying to prevent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator has a copy of the amendment, will he be kind enough to read the last sentence?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take pleasure in doing so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not ask the Senator to do so if the amendment were printed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Without the last subdivision, I prefer this amendment to the amendment which has been offered by the committee. With the last subdivision, it makes the first part of the amendment absolutely negatory, without any value whatsoever, and without any meaning. It is absurd to prohibit a practice in the first subdivision and then license it in the second subdivision of the same paragraph. From my point of view, it is a travesty upon legislation. Now I will read it, in compliance with the request of the Senator from Connecticut:

Nor shall any agent or employee make, or be a member of any committee or other body which shall make or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States or any member or subordinate thereof, without making, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a full and complete disclosure in writing to such person or group of persons of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order in any party thereto—

I do not know what that part of it means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will pardon the Chair. The Chair thinks the Senator has left out the word "and."

Mr. McKELLAR. "And in any party thereto"— nor shall he participate in making—

It is difficult to read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. "Participate in the awarding of"——

Mr. McKELLAR. "Participate in making such contract or giving"——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. "Participate in the awarding of such contract" is the way the copy I have reads.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee is reading from a copy of the amendment which was made before the change suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I am not sure that I have it exactly right myself. I suggest the Senator had better get the original.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well. I will read from the original.

Nor shall any agent or employee make, or be a member of any committee or other body which shall make or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States, or any member or subordinate thereof, without making, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a full and complete disclosure in writing to such persons or group of persons of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and in any party thereto—

That does not make sense—

nor shall he participate in the awarding of such contract or giving said order.

Mr. POMERENE. The words "and in any party thereto" are designed to cover corporations or associations in which he may be interested.

Mr. McKELLAR. I accept that; that is entirely true; perhaps I am a little captious about it.

Now, it is perfectly plain what that means. It does not mean a prohibition of the practice of members of the advisory commission dealing with themselves; it means a licensing of the practice of members of the advisory commission dealing with themselves. The very thing that the Senator from Iowa wanted to prevent in offering his amendment, which is now the committee amendment, is absolutely legalized if the pending amendment is accepted. I can not emphasize the position that I am here taking better than to read the first subdivision, and I will try to read it distinctly, so that Senators may understand it and realize how absolutely it is nullified by the second subdivision of the second paragraph. Now, listen to this:

SEC. 3. No person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the United States in any capacity, including an advisory capacity, shall solicit, induce, or attempt to induce, any person or officer authorized to execute or to direct the execution of contracts on behalf of the United States to make any contract or to give any order for the furnishing to the United States of work, labor, or services, or of materials, supplies or other property of any kind or character, including construction, if such agent or employee has any pecuniary interest in such contract or order, or if he or any firm of which he is a member, or corporation, joint-stock company, or association, of which he is an officer or stockholder or in the pecuniary profits of which he is directly or indirectly interested, shall be a party thereto.

Now, that is an absolute, sweeping prohibition against men who are acting in an advisory capacity dealing with themselves. There can not possibly be any mistake about it. It is an absolute prohibition, explicit, pointed, beyond the shadow of a doubt. Then the next sentence comes right along and calmly nullifies the first. Now, listen how it is nullified. It is nullified almost exactly in the language in which the statement of the first proposition is made:

Nor shall any agent or employee make, or be a member of any committee or other body which shall make or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States, or any member or subordinate thereof, without making, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a full and complete disclosure in writing to such persons or group of persons of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and in any party thereto, nor shall he participate in making such contract or giving said order. Any willful violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

In other words, so far as it means to me, if we want to repeal section 1783 of the Revised Statutes by necessary implication and then legalize the very thing that it is desired by some to prohibit, we ought to adopt this amendment; but if we want to prohibit men from dealing with themselves while on these advisory committees, we ought to adopt the original committee amendment.

It is conceded by everybody here that these men have no power to make contracts. Senators are all familiar with the law by which the Council of National Defense was created. There is not a word in it that permits a contract to be made by any part of the board or any committees of the board. Everyone who has discussed the matter here to-day says they have gone far afield when they have undertaken to contract or to engage in contracting. That was not the purpose of the act at all. The purpose of it was to have their advice; not to have them come here and get altogether, or get certain favored ones together, and have them contract practically with themselves, to the exclusion of all other contractors.

The Senator from Nevada says it was the purpose to bring the sellers together with the Government. Why, the sellers do not have any trouble about getting together. Is it possible that Congress appropriated $500,000 a year for the purpose of getting the sellers together and giving them offices here to look after the sellers' interest in this matter? I do not believe there was any such purpose in our action in making this appropriation of $500,000. Who would have voted for a $500,000 appropriation to bring together here in Washington all the sellers of materials and those who wanted contracts, so that they could get the best possible contracts from the Government?

I do not think anyone would have done so. It would not be fair. There are many contractors here. There are many furnishers here. There are many captains of industry here on these advisory committees; and there are many that are not here. There are more that are not on the committees than there are on the committees. We shall be enacting class legislation, if we adopt this amendment, which absolutely legalizes them; and I for one am going to vote against the substitute and vote for the original amendment offered by the committee.

Mr MARTIN. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has agreed to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business in order that I may have laid before the Senate a House bill providing for the pay of the pages, that will not take three minutes to consider. There is no money with which to pay their per diem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the following bill from the House of Representatives.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 5405) making appropriations for certain session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. May we not have the bill read?

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

SENATE.

For 16 pages for the Senate Chamber, at the rate of $2.50 per day each from and including July 1, 1917, until the close of the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, so much as may be necessary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For the following employees, from and including July 1, 1917, until the close of the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress: Forty-six pages, including 2 riding pages, 4 telephone pages, 1 press-gallery page, and 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $2.50 per day each; 9 messengers in the post office, at the rate of $100 per month each; so much as may be necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the Senate resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I hope we may have a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I hope this matter will go over until to-morrow. I am impressed with the amendment as a general proposition. There is, however, something in regard to the terms of the amendment as it now stands to which I can not reconcile my mind. I should like further time to consider it, and I am inclined to think that other Senators would like to have this amendment go over until to-morrow. It is a very important amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have no objection, if the Senator desires to have it go over. With that amendment the committee amendment will have been completed; and it has been suggested by quite a number of Senators that the Senate take a recess until Monday. I should like to know what the feeling of the Senate is about that. Is it desired that we shall continue to-morrow?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if we could have made an arrangement by which we could have voted on the choice between the Gore substitute and this bill, so that we would have known which one we were actually to work on, I would have been quite agreeable to adjourning until Monday; but we are told—indeed, it is undoubtedly the fact—that as long as anyone demands it, the present bill must be kept before the Senate until it is perfected——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. REED. And that to the exclusion of any consideration of the Gore substitute, which is very different in its scope from the present bill.

That being the case, if we must continue with this bill until it is perfected, then comes the question of substituting the Gore amendment or substitute, and that is to be perfected; so that if we do not keep at work we will not really have reached a point of understanding when the time for voting under the unanimous-consent agreement occurs.

I therefore hope that we can put in to-morrow and get rid of the amendments to the pending bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is perfectly satisfactory to me. I was only acting along the line of the suggestion of quite a number of Senators. Does any Senator desire to proceed with the discussion to-night?

Mr. REED. Can we not proceed with the others?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to have the Senate proceed with the other amendments, leaving this over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio will lie over and be printed.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I now move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the pending bill, and to substitute what I shall have read to the Senate. I will say, however, that this substitute is lying on Senators' desks, excepting that the first section has been somewhat changed in the copy which I shall have read. There is only one other slight change in the bill from the copies on the desks of Senators. I will ask to have it read down to and including section 9.

If any Senator desires, I will have the remaining part of the bill read; but I will say that section 10 is the so-called Nelson amendment to the food-production bill, which passed the Senate on June 1, relating to boards of trade and grain exchanges. There is no change in it. Section 11 is the so-called Poindexter-Walsh amendment, relating to hoarding, gambling, and speculating in foodstuffs. That was attached to the bill which passed on June 1. I shall not ask to have that read unless Senators desire it. To that section I have added a clause that it shall not be construed to repeal the Sherman antitrust law. I deem that important.

The remaining part of the bill, from section 12 on, is in substantial correspondence with and almost a literal transcript of the pending bill, and I shall not ask to have that read unless Senators desire; but down to and including section 9 I ask to have it read to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Oklahoma is offering this as a substitute for the entire bill?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it in order at this time, before the bill has been perfected as a whole, to offer a substitute for the whole of it?

Mr. GORE. It is undoubtedly, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I meant to address the Presiding Officer when I asked if it was in order. I intended that as a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GORE. I rather suspected that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not know whether the Senator did or not from what happened.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Allow me to suggest that that question was determined by the Vice President this morning.

Mr. GORE. Yes; he did; but he held this——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If it has been determined, very well.

Mr. GORE. The Vice President held that the substitute could be offered, that the pending bill could be perfected by amendment, and that the substitute could be perfected by amendment; and that when there were no further amendments to be offered to either one, then the final vote would come as between the two. That was the ruling of the Chair, and that is the course I am seeking to pursue.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. That is satisfactory to me, I am sure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the rule of the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Yes; that is the rule of the Senate.

Mr. REED. I do not understand how we would proceed then. Would we have both before the Senate?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. And be amending each of them?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; either one, as we did the other day, when the liquor amendments were before the Senate.

Mr. REED. My understanding of the rule is this, Mr. President, that if a proposition is made to substitute for a pending bill the proponents of the pending bill have the right to insist that it shall be perfected before anything else is done. When that is completed, then the substitute can be offered and considered, and it can be perfected. Then the question will be upon the substitution. But it would be a peculiar thing to have two bills before the Senate, each of them under consideration and each of them subject to amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator is usually very accurate——

Mr. REED. I am not on parliamentary law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But as to this proposition, clearly he is wrong. If a substitute is presented, the rule requires you to perfect the original before you perfect the substitute; but the two are before the Senate at the same time, each subject to be perfected. You can offer your substitute before you have perfected the original, but you then must perfect the original, under our rule, first, and perfect the substitute second. Then you vote between them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I really can not see any difference between the Senator's statement and my own.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is this difference: They can not keep offering amendments to the original proposition and keep you from getting your substitute before the Senate at all.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; it can be offered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, we can consider it, too; but we can not consider amendments to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, for the RECORD, I want to say that what the Senator from Georgia has stated is well known to be the case under Rule XVIII.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator should have gone further and said that after the House provision is perfected and the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the substitute, and it is perfected, that does not bar the Senate, before the time for a vote arrives, from offering further amendments to the original or to the substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The matter is still open, of course, for revision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has sent to the reporters and obtained the ruling of the Vice President this morning upon this question; and if there is no objection, the Chair will announce the ruling of the Vice President.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], addressing the presiding officer, said:

> Now, Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order at this time to move a substitute for the pending bill—I mean, after the enacting clause?
> The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a pending committee amendment and an agreement to take up the committee amendments first; so that until they are disposed of, at least, the motion to strike out and substitute will not be in order.

There are pending amendments to the bill, and, under the ruling of the Vice President, it would not be in order to——

Mr. GORE. I do not understand that there is a pending amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He limited it to pending committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that there is a pending committee amendment.

Mr. GORE. But, Mr. President, it has been laid aside by the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then, Mr. President, there are other amendments pending to the bill.

Mr. GORE. There are no other amendments pending. They have been printed and are lying on the table, but no Senator has moved their adoption.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; quite a number of them were moved.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. GORE. It was not in order to move their adoption until the committee amendments had been disposed of.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there were quite a number of amendments offered by Senators in view of the possibility of cloture being applied. They are pending now to this bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the agreement affects only committee amendments.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. There is no agreement whatever about individual amendments.

Mr. GORE. And they are not pending until they are moved.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GORE. I yield; yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. A parliamentary inquiry: Under the unanimous-consent agreement is it not necessary to absolutely dispose of committee amendments before any substitute can be offered?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the opinion of the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well. If that is true, then the Senator in charge of the bill can not, under that agreement, consent to lay aside a committee amendment in order that a substitute may be taken up in its place.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that was not done, but the Senator in charge of the bill can not keep a committee amendment pending indefinitely and lay it aside and preclude anybody from offering a substitute. He laid it aside. For that reason I offered this. Otherwise, I could not have made that offer.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GORE. I yield; yes, sir.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment was laid aside, notwithstanding the desire of the Senator from Oregon to have a vote on it. It was laid aside at the request and for the convenience of some of the Senators who wanted to see it in print. I should have liked to have had a vote on it then, but it was temporarily laid aside. However, that does not dispose of it. It is still pending before the Senate. It is still pending as an amendment to the bill; and I agree with the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the rule, I object to the consideration of a substitute until this committee amendment is disposed of, although I should not object—it being nearly 5 o'clock—to taking a recess until to-morrow if we wish to. I do object to the consideration of a substitute at this time, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair feels constrained to rule that the substitute offered by the Senator from Oklahoma is not now in order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to get the reason for the Chair's ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling of the Chair is that the substitute offered by the Senator from Oklahoma is not in order until the committee amendments—which also include, as the Chair understands, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio—have been disposed of.

Mr. REED. The Chair, then, holds that the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge can not himself ask to have the last amendment offered by the committee temporarily laid aside? And when it is temporarily laid aside, which has already been done, is it pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the pending question, and the request to have it temporarily laid aside is not a request to have the amendment withdrawn.

Mr. REED. No; but if it is temporarily laid aside, something else must immediately take its place. The Senate is never without some sort of a parliamentary situation. It seems to me—not desiring to argue the matter with the Chair in this way—that the chairman of the committee can have the bill, or any part of it, laid aside; and when he does, when he makes that request, when there is no objection to it, when that action is taken, when the amendment has been temporarily laid aside, that then that amendment is no longer before the Senate. There is then no committee amendment. It is a temporary disposition of it, and thereupon the right accrues to proceed as though the amendment did not exist.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, let me make a suggestion, with the Senator's permission. If the Senator in charge of the bill can lay an amendment aside, and that precludes us from offering any other amendments, it would keep the bill before the Senate without an amendment to be offered to it from now until next Saturday.

Mr. GORE. That is the point I was going to make. They could just use this as a wind shield to keep anything from being done at all. I hardly think the Senator in charge of the bill means to do that, but that is the effect of the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not the slightest doubt about this matter and has not been from the beginning.

The Senator in charge of the bill when it was taken up by the Senate asked unanimous consent that the committee amendments be first disposed of. That unanimous consent was given. It can only be set aside by unanimous consent. Then a unanimous-consent agreement was entered into that on this particular bill we should begin voting to-morrow week, with other provisos in the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] comes in, as he has a perfect right to do, with a substitute bill to take the place of the bill that is now pending before the Senate. Clearly under Rule XVIII of the Senate—which has been up so many times that surely there can be no dispute about it; the Chair does not quote the rule literally, but quotes it accurately—where there is a motion to substitute or to strike out and insert, which is the same as a motion to substitute, for the purposes of amendment, each of these parts constitutes a question, and each is subject to amendment. The part to be stricken out is first subject to amendment, and the part to be inserted is afterwards subject to amendment; and when the part to be stricken out has been finally amended to the satisfaction of the Senate, then the part to be inserted is to be finally determined upon by the Senate. When both parts have been finally settled to the satisfaction of the Senate, then the vote comes upon the question as to whether the part shall be stricken out and the part inserted.

The unanimous consent granted at the request of the Senator in charge of the bill was that committee amendments should be first considered, regardless of Rule XVIII. Unless set aside by unanimous consent, the committee amendments must first be considered in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. REED and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I just had this suggestion to make as to the facts, not as to the law: The Senator in charge of the bill asked to temporarily lay aside the last committee amendment. The Chair in substance stated, as I recall, that, without objection, that could be done. At least, we are proceeding by unanimous consent to lay it aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there other committee amendments?

Mr, REED. That is the last one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there other amendments that other Senators desire to offer to the original bill?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to say that there have been a good many printed and lying on the table, but the adoption of none of them has been moved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not responsible for this rule. It is as plain as a pikestaff. There is not any doubt about it. If Senators are willing not to offer their amendments, it is their privilege. If they want to offer them, they have a right to offer them to the original bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, nobody has any disposition to preclude those amendments, and, of course, could not under the rule. The point I was making was this: A number of amendments have been printed and are lying on the table, but the adoption of none of those amendments, as I understand, has yet been moved. It was not in order to move their adoption. I have tendered a substitute and moved its adoption, if I am in order to do that, after the amendment has been laid aside.

Bearing the ruling of the Chair in mind, I did not offer it until the Senator in charge of the bill had laid aside the only remaining committee amendment. I think that rendered it eligible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But it did not dispose of it. It was done at somebody's request.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask about a point which I did not understand was entirely covered by the perfectly correct ruling of the Chair. If the last committee amendment is temporarily laid aside, does that preclude the offering of any other amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair said not.

Mr. LODGE. I did not understand the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under Rule XVIII, there is not a question of doubt but that any Senator may now, if the committee amendment is temporarily laid aside——

Mr. LODGE. I understand about Rule XVIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the committee has offered all the amendments it wants to, any Senator may offer an amendment to the original bill before any vote can be taken upon the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LODGE. My question was not directed to Rule XVIII.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and have moved its adoption, and requested that it be read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, have we not the right to have this amendment in the nature of a substitute offered; and thereafter, under Rule XVIII, have not the friends of the original measure the preference in continuing to offer their amendments and to dispose of them first, after which we can offer amendments to the substitute that has just been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so stated it, to the satisfaction of the Chair, whether it was stated to the satisfaction of anybody else or not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then the practical proposition is, Why is not the Senator from Oklahoma in order to offer his substitute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He is in order to offer his substitute but not to have a vote upon it.

Mr. GORE. I am not asking for a vote, but I send the proposed substitute to the desk and ask that it may be read down to section 9.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is to strike out and insert, and brings the question then under rule 18.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a parliamentary question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota will state it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to know what amendment is actually pending to the bill at the present time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. While it is an amendment to an amendment, as a matter of fact it is a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not heard of the final disposition of the amendment known as section 3. That was under consideration and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] offered an amendment as a substitute for that committee amendment. That was under discussion. I objected to any other amendment being offered until that was disposed of in some manner, and I do not understand that it has been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair is not responsible for statements made to the Chair. The Chair was informed that every committee amendment had been disposed of except one, which had been passed over by unanimous consent until to-morrow morning.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not understand that it had been passed over by unanimous consent, nor that any unanimous consent was asked. I do not think the RECORD will disclose that there was any unanimous consent requested. If it does, I will stand corrected, of course.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am about to ask for an executive session, if it pleases the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection.

Mr. STONE. I wish to state in advance that I have only taken a few moments of the time of the Senate in the discussion of this exceedingly important bill. I shall ask the Chair, with the hope of receiving recognition to-morrow morning when the Senate convenes, to occupy less than 40 minutes' time of the Senate to give expression as to the reason why I intend to vote for the bill, and I would be complimented if as many Senators as possible might be here to hear me.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. LENROOT managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. SIMS, and Mr. ESCH managers of the conference on the part of the House.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., Friday, July 13, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, July 14, 1917, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 13, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Take us, O Lord God, our heavenly Father, and make us Thine in thought, word, and deed, that we may blossom day by day into the fruits of righteousness and perpetuate ourselves in the great work whereunto Thou hast called us, that we may be worthy of Thy preferments and leave behind us a record worthy of emulation in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, July 11, 1917, was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating the address of the President of the United States to the mine operators and manufacturers of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address of the President of the United States to the mine operators and manufacturers of the United States. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the address:

AN ADDRESS TO THE MINE OPERATORS AND MANUFACTURERS OF THE UNITED STATES BY PRESIDENT WILSON.

"My fellow countrymen, the Government is about to attempt to determine the prices at which it will ask you henceforth to furnish various supplies which are necessary for the prosecution of the war, and various materials which will be needed in the industries by which the war must be sustained. We shall of course try to determine them justly and to the best advantage of the Nation as a whole; but justice is easier to speak of than to arrive at, and there are some considerations which I hope we shall all keep steadily in mind while this particular problem of justice is being worked out. I, therefore, take the liberty of stating very candidly my own view of the situation and of the principles which should guide both the Government and the mine owners and manufacturers of the country in this difficult matter.

"A just price must, of course, be paid for everything the Government buys. By a just price I mean a price which will sustain the industries concerned in a high state of efficiency, provide a living for those who conduct them, enable them to pay good wages, and make possible the expansions of their enterprises which will from time to time become necessary as the stupendous undertakings of this great war develop. We could not wisely or reasonably do less than pay such prices. They are necessary for the maintenance and development of industry, and the maintenance and development of industry are necessary for the great task we have in hand.

"But I trust that we shall not surround the matter with a mist of sentiment. Facts are our masters now. We ought not to put the acceptance of such prices on the ground of patriotism. Patriotism has nothing to do with profits in a case like this. Patriotism and profits ought never in the present circumstances to be mentioned together. It is perfectly proper to discuss profits as a matter of business, with a view to maintaining the integrity of capital and the efficiency of labor in these tragical months when the liberty of free men everywhere and of industry itself trembles in the balance; but it would be absurd to discuss them as a motive for helping to serve and save our country. Patriotism leaves profits out of the question. In these days of our supreme trial, when we are sending hundreds of thousands of our young men across the seas to serve a great cause, no true man who stays behind to work for them and sustain them by his labor will ask himself what he is personally going to make out of that labor. No true patriot will permit himself to take toll of their heroism in money or seek to grow rich by the shedding of their blood. He will give as freely and with as unstinted self-sacrifice as they. When they are giving their lives, will he not give at least his money?

"I hear it insisted that more than a just price, more than a price that will sustain our industries, must be paid; that it is necessary to pay very liberal and unusual profits in order to 'stimulate' production; that nothing but pecuniary rewards will do it—rewards paid in money, not in the mere liberation of the world. I take it for granted that those who argue thus do not stop to think what that means. Do they mean that you must be paid, must be bribed, to make your contribution, a contribution that costs you neither a drop of blood nor a tear, when the whole world is in travail and men everywhere depend upon and call to you to bring them out of bondage and make the world a fit place to live in again amidst peace and justice? Do they mean that you will exact a price, drive a bargain, with the men who are enduring the agony of this war on the battle field, in the trenches, amidst the lurking dangers of the sea, or with the bereaved women and the pitiful children, before you will come forward to do your duty and give some part of your life, in easy peaceful fashion, for the things we are fighting for—the things we have pledged our fortunes, our lives, our sacred honor, to vindicate and defend—liberty and justice and fair dealing and the peace of nations? Of course you will not. It is inconceivable. Your patriotism is of the same self-denying stuff as the patriotism of the men dead or maimed on the fields of France or else it is no patriotism at all. Let us never speak, then, of profits and of patriotism in the same sentence, but face facts and meet them. Let us do sound business, but not in the midst of a mist. Many a grievous burden of taxation will be laid on this Nation, in this generation and in the next, to pay for this war; let us see to it that for every dollar that is taken from the people's pockets it shall be possible to obtain a dollar's worth of the sound stuffs they need.

"Let me turn for a moment to the shipowners of the United States and the other ocean carriers whose example they have followed and ask them if they realize what obstacles, what almost insuperable obstacles, they have been putting in the way of the successful prosecution of this war by the ocean freight rates they have been exacting? They are doing everything that high freight charges can do to make the war a failure, to make it impossible. I do not say that they realize this or intend it. The thing has happened naturally enough, because the commercial processes which we are content to see operate in ordinary times have without sufficient thought been continued into a period where they have no proper place. I am not questioning motives. I am merely stating a fact, and stating it in order that attention may be fixed upon it. The fact is that those who have fixed war freight rates have taken the most effective means in their power to defeat the armies engaged against Germany. When they realize this, we may, I take it for granted, count upon them to reconsider the whole matter. It is high time. Their extra hazards are covered by war-risk insurance.

"I know and you know what response to this great challenge of duty and of opportunity the Nation will expect of you, and I know what response you will make. Those who do not respond, who do not respond in the spirit of those who have gone to give their lives for us on bloody fields far away, may safely be left to be dealt with by opinion and the law, for the law must, of course, command these things. I am dealing with the matter thus publicly and frankly, not because I have any doubt or fear as to the result, but only in order that in all our thinking and in all our dealings with one another we may move in a perfectly clear air of mutual understanding.

"And there is something more that we must add to our thinking. The public is now as much part of the Government as are the Army and Navy themselves; the whole people in all their activities are now mobilized and in service for the accomplishment of the Nation's task in this war; it is in such circumstances impossible justly to distinguish between industrial purchases made by the Government and industrial purchases made by the managers of individual industries, and it is just as much our duty to sustain the industries of the country, all the industries that contribute to its life, as it is to sustain our forces in the field and on the sea. We must make the prices to the public the same as the prices to the Government. Prices mean the same thing everywhere now; they mean the efficiency or the inefficiency of the Nation, whether it is the Government that pays them or not. They mean victory or defeat. They mean that America will win her place once for all among the foremost free nations of the world, or that she will sink to defeat and become a second-rate power alike in thought and in action. This is a day of her reckoning, and every man amongst us must personally face that reckoning along with her.

"The case needs no arguing. I assume that I am only expressing your own thoughts—what must be in the mind of every true man when he faces the tragedy and the solemn glory of the present war for the emancipation of mankind. I summon you to a great duty, a great privilege, a shining dignity and distinction. I shall expect every man who is not a slacker to be at my side throughout this great enterprise. In it no man can win honor who thinks of himself."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1720. An act to provide for the award of medals of honor and distinguished-service medals; and

S. 979. An act for the promotion and retirement of Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution of the following title on July 9, 1917:

S. J. Res. 67. Joint resolution to fix the status and rights of officers of the Public Health Service when serving with the Coast Guard, the Army, or the Navy.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1720. An act to provide for the award of medals of honor and distinguished-service medals; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 979. An act for the promotion and retirement of Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES FOR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 1811, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 1811, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, let the bill be reported by title.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 1811. An act providing for the counting of service in the Army and Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service, providing for the issuance of patents to such land to his widow or minor children.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Were there any Senate amendments to our bill, or did they agree to our amendments?

Mr. FERRIS. They were anxious to agree to our amendments.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senate has not made any amendments to that bill, but they disagreed to our amendments?

Mr. FERRIS. That is it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. LENROOT.

PREFERENTIAL SHIPMENTS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2356, the preferential shipping bill, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2356. An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent to take the bill S. 2356 from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is the Senate bill. The request is to insist on the House amendments.

The SPEAKER. And insist on the House amendments to the Senate bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. SIMS, and Mr. ESCH.

FOURTH OF JULY ADDRESS BY THE SPEAKER.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech made on the Fourth of July, 1917, by our Speaker, Mr. CLARK of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by the Speaker on the Fourth of July at the Washington Monument. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 20 minutes following the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent to address the House not to exceed 20 minutes following the conclusion of the address of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the address of the gentleman from Alabama I may be permitted to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the address of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] he may be permitted to address the House not to exceed five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes, following the address of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the address of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] he may be permitted to speak for not to exceed 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

APPROPRIATION FOR SESSION EMPLOYEES.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5405) making appropriations for certain session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

SENATE.

For 16 pages for the Senate Chamber at the rate of $2.50 per day each from and including July 1, 1917, until the close of the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, so much as may be necessary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For the following employees, from and including July 1, 1917, until the close of the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress: Forty-six pages, including 2 riding pages, 4 telephone pages, 1 press gallery page, and 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $2.50 per day each; 9 messengers in the post office at the rate of $100 per month each; so much as may be necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, provision is made for these——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, are these the same employees that were on the rolls before the 1st of July?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are the same employees. They were provided for until the 30th of June, and they are provided for in the legislative bill from the beginning of the regular session of Congress. This is to make provision for them from the 1st day of July until this session ends.

Mr. MANN. The purpose of this is to take care of them because of the extraordinary delay in adjourning Congress?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I expressed the opinion, and it may be a source of consolation to Members to have it stated publicly, that Congress in all probability could not, and as a matter of duty it should not, adjourn at all prior to the next regular session. I am still of the opinion that the most important thing that the Members of Congress can do is to stay in Washington and attend to the public business.

Mr. MANN. That is a very foolish thing. I went away myself for a while, hoping that Congress would expedite its work, but it has not done so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the country went along beautifully. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman himself has been away most of the time. I hope he will stay away. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I have been here all the time, with the exception of the week of the Fourth of July, when it was understood there would be no business transacted. I expect to spend a very pleasant summer here, in company with the gentleman from Illinois and the other industrious Members of the House, assiduously attending to the public business under the guidance of our distinguished Speaker. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I have had a very good vacation. I do not care personally, but I think the country would be better off if we adjourned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it would not. I have so much confidence in the Congress that I am much more content to have it in session than to delegate all the powers of the Government to the executive department of the Government and adjourn. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. That is all we are doing while we are here—delegating more power to the executive department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true; but we are here and can watch many things so that they will not happen, when they otherwise might happen.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman name any of those things?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I may name them in the future.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have been watching anxiously to see things happen that I hoped would not happen, but they have all happened.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the gentleman will continue to live with the knowledge that we are likely to meet disappointments in life. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman indicate what functions Congress possibly can perform except appropriating large sums of money, now that the bills that are necessary have practically been passed and after all the functions have been practically turned over to the Executive?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; there are a great many that have not been. If the gentleman sat in my office, he would appreciate that there are a good many things that have not been turned over yet and probably will not be.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is very refreshing to hear it. If the gentleman has anything in his office that has not been turned over, that is the only place I know of where things have not turned over. I hope the gentleman will stay here and not let them get away. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Florida rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Florida rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I desire to state that in consultation with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] they have agreed that I might proceed for five minutes if the House were willing at this time. I ask that permission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for not to exceed five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to ask leave to insert in the RECORD an article that appeared in the Washington Post of July 12, being an address of the President of the United States to the people of America. The distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], however, has anticipated me and has offered that same document. Therefore I shall not now offer it. But I want to say this, Mr. Speaker: My course in this House during these troublous times has been for peace. I stood also for the volunteer system. A majority of my colleagues disagreed, and then their will became my will.

And I want to say now that it is the duty of every American citizen, whether naturalized or native, to stand firmly by the Government in this crisis. [Applause.] The man who does not do it is not worthy of citizenship and ought to be stripped of that citizenship. [Applause.]

I desire to say further that the President of the United States in that remarkable statement demonstrated to all the world that he was not only President of the United States but that he was worthy to be the Commander in Chief of the armies and navies of this Republic. [Applause.] No blood money should be made in this war. The boys and the men are going to the front and baring their breasts to the bullets of the foe, and those who remain at home and coin money ought to be made to be satisfied with a reasonable profit upon their work.

I want to say further, Mr. Speaker, that I hope and trust, as the newspapers indicate this morning, that if any of these great institutions undertake longer to delay the program of the Government in this war the strong arm of the Government will reach out and take their plants and operate them itself for the benefit of the Government. The last one of them ought to be treated that way.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am interested in the gentleman's statement. He may have some personal information that I am not aware of.

In the morning paper to which he alludes I have found on the left-hand column a long, splendid article saying that the steel interests and the President and the Council of National Defense have talked over the situation and have come to a very satisfactory and mutually advantageous arrangement. Everybody was happy; everybody was satisfied; and the Federal Trade Commission was going to ascertain the cost of producing steel. The facts were going to be ascertained by the Government, including the amount that would constitute a reasonable profit.

Now, so much for that article. Right parallel with it, in two other columns, was a high-sounding, flamboyant, extravagant bunch of phrases seeking to laud the President for performing superhuman duties in bringing to their knees the officials of the Steel Trust. Now, which is correct? I do not know.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to state to the gentleman that I am not in the confidence of the Steel Trust. I can not speak for them. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is speaking for the President, and he probably knows——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But I know this, that they yielded when they had to yield, and they did not yield before.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Has the gentleman any additional information to give us on that subject?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have no further time, and under my agreement with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] I can not honorably ask for an extension.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, on April 28 the selective-draft bill passed this body by a vote of 397 in favor to 24 opposed. Three days later the bill passed the Senate without a record vote, and, indeed, without a division. He would have been a rash man a year ago to-day, or even six months ago to-day, who had predicted that the Congress of the United States, whatever the conditions or the emergencies, would pass, even by a majority vote, a law imposing compulsory military service upon the young men of the land. Why was this bill, in many ways a revolutionary bill, enacted into law by so overwhelming a vote of both branches of Congress? I suppose it was because every man in favor of the bill saw clearly that its fundamental principle was one not only of efficient and speedy preparation but also of equity, justice, fairness and democracy.

It was no doubt inevitable that a law of this kind, proceeding upon a principle new to the present generation, at least, should not have been without its faults. Yet if those faults are of a nature which impair the fairness and the democracy of the law, by just so much does the law fall short of the ideal. I desire to-day to point out what seem to me two or three weaknesses in the law—weaknesses, I think them, which go to the essence and which will in the future increasingly mar in a most serious way the effective and equitable operation of the law.

Section 2 of the law provides in part that—> quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia * * * shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof. * * *

Section 4 provides in part that—> notwithstanding the exemptions enumerated herein, each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall be required to supply its quota in the proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States.

If the proportion of aliens were equal in each State of the Union, or if aliens of the prescribed ages were liable under the act to military service, the foregoing provisions of the law would achieve a result both scientific and equitable. But as the proportion of aliens varies tremendously among the several States of the Union, and as aliens are specifically exempted by the language of section 2, basing the draft upon "liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens," the result achieved is neither scientific nor equitable. Aliens are, of course, included in total population and hence in determining the quota of a given State; they are, however, excluded from rendering military service. The net result of this, in a word, is that the liability to be held for military service upon a given citizen in a State where there are many aliens is vastly greater than the liability of a given citizen in a State where there are few aliens.

Because of the importance of this point let me, even at the risk of prolixity, indicate in some detail how the law will actually operate in this respect. There are in the United States, in round numbers, 100,000,000 persons. Pursuant to the selective-draft law 10,000,000 persons, or one-tenth of the total population, registered on June 5. Let us assume, for convenience, that the President will in the near future call to the colors 1,000,000 men. This morning's newspapers indicate that the names of about 1,300,000 will be drawn, it being expected that that number will yield an army of 687,000 men. Now, let us take four States—A, B, C, and D—each of which has a total population of 1,000,000 persons, and each of which registered 100,000 men on June 5. Total population being the test of the quota under the law and each State having by hypothesis 1 per cent of the total population of the United States, the share of each under the call of the President for 1,000,000 men will be 1 per cent of 1,000,000 men, or 10,000 men. Let us assume that just one-half, or 50,000, of the 100,000 who registered in each State will, for physical or other reasons, be exempt from rendering military service. The quota of each of the four States will then be 10,000 men, to be drawn from an available roster of 50,000 men.

State A has practically no aliens. There is but one chance in five, 20 per cent, that a given registered eligible in that State will be actually held to military service.

State B has an alien population of 20 per cent, 80 per cent being citizens. Bearing in mind that aliens are exempt from military service under the law, 20 per cent of the 50,000, 10,000, will thus be exempt. The remaining 40,000 will be required to furnish the same quota of 10,000 as that required of State A. There is thus one chance in four, 25 per cent, that a given registered eligible in State B will be held to military service.

State C has an alien population of 30 per cent, 70 per cent being citizens. Thirty per cent of the 50,000, 15,000, will thus be exempt. The remaining 35,000 will be required to furnish the same quota of 10,000 as that required of States A and B. There is thus one chance in three and a half, about 28½ per cent, that a given registered eligible in State C will be held to military service.

State D has an alien population of 40 per cent, 60 per cent being citizens. Forty per cent of the 50,000, 20,000, will thus be exempt. The remaining 30,000 will be required to furnish the same quota of 10,000 as that required of States A, B, and C. There is thus one chance in three, 33⅓ per cent, that a given registered eligible in State D will be held to military service.

To phrase the disproportion in liability to service of men in the four States in terms of percentage, a given registered eligible in State B is 25 per cent more likely to be called out for service than his brother eligible in State A; a given registered eligible in State C is 43 per cent more likely to be called out than his brother eligible in State A; and a given registered eligible in State D is 66⅔ per cent more likely to be called out than his brother eligible in State A.

There is surely no fairness nor propriety in any such result. The law falls short of its true goal in bringing about such a disparity. Equal liability throughout the United States to military service should be the test, not the accident of residence in one State rather than in another. Let us examine the actual registration by States in order to determine whether or not the objection which I have thus advanced is practical or only theoretical. I shall insert with my remarks, as Appendix A, a table which I have prepared showing total registration by States, aliens by States, alien enemies, and percentage of aliens to total population. The tabulations under the draft law are still incomplete, and final figures may show slight variations from the figures which I am to-day submitting. I am satisfied, however, that the variations will not be considerable nor sufficient seriously to modify the conclusions justly to be drawn. There are seven States—Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee—with an alien population of less than 1 per cent. There are 15 States—Florida, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wisconsin—with an alien population ranging from 1 to 10 per cent. On the other hand, Arizona has an alien population of 39.6 per cent; California, 22.7 per cent; Connecticut, 36.6 per cent; Massachusetts, 29.5 per cent; New Hampshire, 25.3 per cent; New Jersey, 25.6 per cent; New York, 22.2 per cent; Pennsylvania, 21.1 per cent; and Rhode Island, 28.2 per cent. A given individual in the group of States last mentioned is vastly more liable to be called out for military service than his relative who happens to reside in either of the first two groups cited. Referring back to the supposititious comparisons, a man in Arizona or Connecticut is 60 or 65 per cent more liable to be called than his friend in Arkansas or South Carolina.

What is the remedy? Obviously to base the quotas of States upon the total population thereof liable for military service rather than upon total population merely. The bill as passed by the Senate—see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 1, 1917, page 1610—recognized this and based the quotas for the several States upon "the population thereof liable for military service as shown by the registration provided for herein." The House draft omitted this provision. When the bill went to conference early in May I called to the attention of the conferees the importance of retaining the Senate language and indicated what seemed to me controlling reasons in support of the wisdom and justice of the provision. Nevertheless it was eliminated from the conference report and does not appear in the law. Senator CALDER, of New York, and I have pending in the Senate and House, respectively, identical bills making the basis of the quotas the population of the several States liable under the law to military service. It is doubtless too late to modify the quotas which will be called out under the proclamation of the President understood soon to be forthcoming. Men high in authority tell us, however, that the country may before many months go by be required to raise an army of two or four or six or eight or even ten million men. It is, I believe, of vital consequence that some such amendment to the law as that submitted by Senator CALDER and me should be enacted before the subsequent calls for troops are issued by the President.

As the months go by and as the United States gradually acquires a keener realization of what war actually means than perhaps it possesses to-day, it is of the most urgent consequence that every detail of the law and its operation should be so scrutinized as to avoid the slightest hint of inequality or discrimination. So long as quotas are based upon total population and aliens are exempted from service there is ground for the severest criticism. No man can say with positiveness what dire consequences this criticism may in course of time engender. Now is the time to work out the remedy—a remedy simple, speedy, and certain. Let the man in Carolina and the man in Connecticut bear exactly the same burden. No true man in either State would seek favor at the expense of his brother. Under leave to extend my remarks I shall print, as Appendix B, the pending bill to which I have referred.

But the inequality in the law goes still further. Section 2 provides that "quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof." In other words, the quota of a given city which has a tremendous alien population—and it must be always remembered that aliens are absolutely exempt from the operation of the law—must contribute its quota of the State's quota on the basis of its total population. The argument which I have already made in dealing with the quotas of States will perhaps be sufficient to indicate the impropriety of basing quotas of subdivisions of States also upon the total population of such subdivisions. In giving specific illustrations of the additional inequality thus resulting I am greatly handicapped by the fact that the registration returns for cities and other subdivisions of States are still unpublished. Through my own investigations and in part through the courtesy of the Census Bureau I am, however, able to give a few instances of the operation of the law along this line.

My home city of Lowell registered 10,979 men on June 5; sixty-six hundred and fifty-six of these were eligibles and forty-three hundred and twenty-three, being aliens, were ineligibles. Thus almost exactly 40 per cent—39.4, to be exact—of the registered males of the city of Lowell, though included in determining its quota, can not be required to render military service. In the neighboring city of Lawrence ninety-seven hundred and fifty-seven men registered on June 5, of whom forty-nine hundred and forty-six were eligibles and forty-eight hundred and eleven were aliens. Here almost exactly 50 per cent—49.3, or one man out of every two men—are exempt from military service. A man in Lowell or Lawrence will thus find that his chances of being called out are about twice as great as his relative in another city or town of Massachusetts which has a negligible alien population.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry there?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it the gentleman's remedy to make aliens available for service also? And if it is not, does he not get out of one trouble into another?

Mr. ROGERS. I am going to discuss that in the second half of my remarks if the gentleman will permit me to reserve my answer until that time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have been informed that it is the purpose of the War Department to draw the numbers of the men who are to be conscripted in the first round, and that the numbers will be the same in all the conscription districts. While the gentleman's State will have to furnish its full quota, as though every eligible man was subject to military service, yet when it comes to a city, the same numbers will be drawn in each city, so that where the number of men registered is relatively much smaller, as in the case of Lowell and some other cities which the gentleman has mentioned, there will be only the same percentage of registered men taken for service as in any other community.

Mr. ROGERS. Each city or registration subdivision of a city will furnish its quota on the basis of the total population thereof.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am under the impression that it will furnish its quota according to its number of registered men only.

Mr. ROGERS. That is not correct.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is the State that furnishes on the basis of the population, not the city.

Mr. ROGERS. I have taken up this matter repeatedly with the Provost Marshal General. Under the explicit language of the law he has officially ruled that any recognized subdivision of a State—a city, a town, or a group of towns, for example—must furnish its quota on the basis of its total population. The law so provides; and he has no discretion, even if he wished to have discretion.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the fact that the quota is only applicable to the State?

Mr. ROGERS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I read the law a moment ago—

> Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof.

This is an extract from section 2 of the law.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman think that applies to the registration districts?

Mr. ROGERS. I think it applies; but it is immaterial what I think, because the Provost Marshal General thinks so.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. What interpretation is placed on the word "subdivision"? Is it a congressional district, a county, a city, or does it mean the registration district?

Mr. ROGERS. A city of 30,000 is a subdivision; a city of 60,000 is two subdivisions; a city of 300,000 is 10 subdivisions.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then it means registration districts?

Mr. ROGERS. Not always. In town or other units smaller than cities in my part of the country a group of towns may be made a subdivision. In other parts of the country, where the county is the usual administrative unit, the county exclusive of large cities is made the subdivision for the purpose of administering the law. The aim is to have a separate unit for each 30,000 of total population.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, as I understand, a subdivision means a registration district?

Mr. ROGERS. I understand that, in general, it means exactly that.

I annex herewith a table showing the registration figures of a few cities furnished me by the Census Bureau:

City.	Total registered males.	Citizens and declarants for citizenship.	Aliens.	Percentage of aliens to eligibles	Alien enemies.
Boston, Mass	77,223	56,529	20,694	26.8	437
Fall River, Mass	10,574	6,437	4,137	39.1	10
New Bedford, Mass	12,541	7,126	5,418	43.2	13
Lawrence, Mass	9,757	4,946	4,811	49.3	32
New York City, N. Y	183,640	424,944	158,696	27.2	12,140
Lowell, Mass	10,979	6,656	4,323	39.4	.....

Of course, the presence of a large percentage of aliens is by no means characteristic only of the large cities. It will be found in many small places, especially when they are cities or towns with large manufacturing industries of some kind. The town of Westford, in my congressional district, had, when the Federal census of 1910 was taken, a population of 2,851. The secretary of the board of selectmen of that town, Capt. Sherman H. Fletcher, writes me:

Here is the situation in Westford: Out of the 255 registered here, 119 were aliens—nearly one-half. It does not seem fair or just that the remaining 136 should be obliged to furnish this town's allotment.

In certain registration districts of New York City the situation will be found to be still more extreme. The actual registration figures are not yet available, but figures furnished by Senator CALDER—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 12, 19 7, page 3490—give some idea of the state of things. In one of the districts of the borough of Brooklyn only 5,846 men—including, of course, men of all ages—were eligible to vote for President last fall. Yet 13,387 men between 21 and 30 registered on June 5 for the draft. If the general percentage which prevailed throughout the United States is a fair criterion, the total population of that district is about 134,000. Its quota under the first call will be about 1,350. Probably not more than 1,200 or 1,500 of the 5,846 who were eligible to vote last fall are between 21 and 30. In a word, practically every man in that district between 21 and 30, whether physically sound or physically unsound, will be needed if the district is to send forth even its first quota under the original call of the President. There are about 33 assembly districts in Greater New York where the registration for the draft nearly equaled or exceeded the total election registration for 1916. In very many cases the registration for the draft greatly exceeded the election registration.

These facts speak for themselves; extended argument is unnecessary. Massachusetts as a whole, with an alien population of about 30 per cent, nevertheless is, under the present law, required to furnish its portion of troops on a quota basis which includes those aliens, although they themselves are, without exception, exempt. As I have previously stated, the likelihood of one of its citizens being held to military service is nearly 30 per cent in excess of the likelihood of a citizen in a State with a small alien population; but piled on this indefensible disproportion we find that a city like Fall River, New Bedford, Lawrence, or Lowell, with an alien population of 40 to 50 per cent, must, nevertheless, contribute its proportion to the State quota also on the basis of total population. In other words, such a city must contribute a grossly excessive quota of a grossly excessive quota. Inequality is added to inequality. A citizen of Lowell or Lawrence or Fall River is three or four times as liable to be held to military service as a resident of a city and State without many aliens therein resident. A citizen of some election districts in New York City has practically no chance of escaping even the first draft, while a citizen of Mississippi has four chances out of five of so escaping.

It will be noticed that the amendment offered by Senator CALDER and me, and already referred to, basing quotas both of States and subdivisions upon persons liable to military service, cures the inequalities in the case of cities and towns and fractions thereof as well as in the case of States as a whole.

There are other matters which in a degree result in inequality, although they probably can not so easily be cured as those to which I have already referred. Take the case, for example, of a city or town which has a large State penal or eleemosynary institution within its borders. Such an institution collects its inmates from all over the State. Those inmates are included in the census of the town and hence in determining the quota of the town. Yet in no true sense are they residents of the town. Take a case within my own knowledge—Tewksbury. The census shows the population of Tewksbury to be 5,265. Of this population 2,636, or slightly more than half, are inmates of the State infirmary, which is located in Tewksbury. The draft registration of the town, exclusive of the infirmary, was 115, of whom 45 were aliens. Thus there were only 70 eligibles. The registration at the infirmary was 155, practically all of whom for obvious reasons will probably be exempt. If the quota of the town be based upon a total which includes the infirmary inmates, the liability to service of a given eligible in Tewksbury will be substantially double that which would be his if the infirmary were not located in Tewksbury. As I stated a moment ago, the population of an infirmary or of a prison is not fairly to be deemed, certainly for this purpose, a real portion of the population of the town in whose borders it happens to be located. The inmates should either be excluded from total populations in making up draft quotas or they should be treated as still residents of their towns of origin.

Again, a city or a town may have a great munitions plant, or some other industry or industries, the carrying on of which is absolutely essential to the carrying on of the war. The workers in these industries will doubtless ultimately be generally exempted by the district registration boards under the language of the selective-draft law, which permits the exemption of "persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency." Many cases will arise where extreme hardship will fall upon those who are not employed in such industries and whose liability to service will be very greatly increased because the quota of their community will be based upon total population, although the war workers, constituting oftentimes an overwhelming proportion of the population, will be exempted.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it not true that revised estimates of the population have now been made by the department which take into consideration the population occurring through centralization of munition works, and so forth?

Mr. ROGERS. I am aware of the ruling of the Provost Marshal General, to which the gentleman refers, but the difficulty will be, I suspect, that admitting there may be a theoretical remedy somewhere State officials are going to say it is not practicable as an administrative matter to allow credit for a city or town which has a great penal institution or a great wartime industry of some kind. I am afraid that the result, however equitably regulated by the Provost Marshal General, will often in the last analysis be inequitably administered when it gets down to the several States and the enrollment officers of the several States.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Gladly.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman is criticizing on the basis of the unit which is to be the comprehensive registration unit. Has it not been published that the unit is to be the county or portion of the city containing not more than 30,000, so that this inequity which the gentleman speaks of would be distributed over what would be a county shire or equivalent unit instead of the registration unit?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not think—even admitting that the gentleman's suggestion is correct, which I do not altogether agree to—that it would in the least alter my insistence that the basis of the draft, both for States and all subdivisions of States, should be total registration, or, rather, total eligibility, and not total population.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is made solely on the matter of registration, does not that offer a temptation to escape registration where one State that exceeds the estimate and another State has only 50 per cent, the State most loyal and the most patriotic would have to furnish the greater number of men, while the State less patriotic would thereby profit by the lack of patriotism?

Mr. ROGERS. That is an important point, and I will address myself to it at this time.

Should the quota be based upon an estimated population, which is itself arbitrarily based upon the number of those who saw fit to register, or should it be based upon population as disclosed by the latest available census, Federal or State, and such other elements, other than draft-registration figures, as may seem worthy of consideration?

The reason for not taking too seriously draft-registration figures themselves in determining the quota of a State or subdivision thereof is obvious: If the citizens of a State or of a subdivision thereof are in large numbers derelict in their duty to register, the quota should not thereby be reduced. No State and no subdivision of a State should be allowed to profit by its own wrongdoing. It should not be allowed, so to speak, to pull itself down by its own boot straps. Of course, I do not venture to say that there has, in fact, been widespread failure to register in certain States or groups of States; I am dealing only with the figures presented to us by the Census Bureau and with what seems to me the theoretically sound method of procedure.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. How, in the light of the suggestion that the gentleman is making, would it affect the drafting of the nonvoting citizens of the South, the Negro race? Are they to be compelled to serve?

Mr. ROGERS. I suppose so.

Mr. MEEKER. Or would they be treated as are aliens in the North?

Mr. ROGERS. They are citizens of the United States, as the gentleman knows very well.

Mr. MEEKER. Are they to be drafted into the service?

Mr. ROGERS. As far as I know, they are.

Mr. MEEKER. And they would be allotted to the Southern States?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. ROGERS. I prefer not to yield if the gentleman's question is along this same line.

Mr. HARDY. I wish the gentleman might have stopped yielding before he reached me.

Mr. ROGERS. How in the world was I to know what the question was going to be? [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. Well, I wish to deny the insinuation of the gentleman from Missouri that there is any nonvoting population in Texas.

Mr. BURNETT. How about East St. Louis?

Mr. ROGERS. The Census Bureau has apparently seen fit to base quotas solely upon registration figures. Thus, a State which registered 50 or 60 or 70 per cent of the number which the Census Bureau announced that it thought it should register is to be permitted to furnish a quota based upon its own deficient registration, and not upon its population as estimated by the Census Bureau. In the "estimates of population," made public within a day or two by the Bureau of the Census, it is said:

> The total registration, as shown by the preliminary telegraphic returns, 9,659,382, was divided by the total population of continental United States, exclusive of Alaska, as heretofore estimated by the Census Bureau, 103,635,300, in order to obtain the proportion which the registrants represented of the total population. The resulting figure, 9.32 per cent, was assumed to represent the proportion which the registrants in each geographical unit represented of the total population thereof. * * * The simplest and speediest method—that based on the assumption that the proportion which the registrants represent of the total population is the same throughout the country—was adopted.

Of course, the solution adopted by the Census Bureau is entirely just if it was the forecast of the bureau itself which was in error; but it is entirely unjust if dereliction on the part of the citizens of certain States is the true explanation. As Appendix C, I shall print a table published by the Census Bureau on June 25 showing the total registration by States and the percentage by States of registration to the advance census forecast; the preface to the estimates of population issued by the Census Bureau, from which a quotation has already been made; and a summary showing estimated population of each State, which will arbitrarily be assumed to be the population for the purposes of determining quotas, together with the population of the States, as shown by the census of 1910 and the increase or decrease of the estimated population for the draft, as compared with the 1910 census population.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Gladly.

Mr. HARDY. It occurs to me that possibly the law which gives credit for all those now engaged either in voluntary service or National Guard might be amended this much to give further credit to any locality for any national who had volunteered for service in their own country. For instance, in one of your districts if you had a thousand Italians and they, under the permission of our law, joined the Italian Army, I believe your district ought to receive credit for the number of its inhabitants that joined the army of the allies, whether it be our Army or the allies. But it would not be fair to the rest of the country to diminish the quota of your population subject to service by all of the foreign elements you might have there who partake of the benefits of our Government and are in every way served by the war to allow them to entirely escape and relieve the great foreign element. That would allow our foreign population to enjoy all the benefits of our Government and escape its military service, perhaps its greatest burden.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman will observe that I have throughout been dealing with this situation from the point of view of the individual——

Mr. HARDY. I understand.

Mr. ROGERS. And have been emphasizing that under our universal-service law rigid equality is the only reasonable and proper and democratic basis of exacting military service. It is no doubt true that alien populations should not be wholly disregarded. It may be that the gentleman will agree with me as I proceed in my remarks that something can be done toward including them in our forces.

Mr. HARDY. That is what I want to see the gentleman come to.

Mr. ROGERS. I prefer to defer that part of the discussion, however, for a moment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not think that the plan now adopted is a clear violation of the law? Does it not in reality amount to a draft upon registration and not upon population?

Mr. ROGERS. I entirely agree with the gentleman. The answer of the Census Bureau, however, would doubtless be that population was, in accordance with the law, the test of the quotas, the population being estimated by the bureau from the registration figures.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. OSBORNE. In my district we have the honor of having a soldiers' home. There are 3,500 inmates of that home, men who have in time past done their duty to their country. In the 30,000 that will comprise that district, do I understand that the eligibles for service will have to make up the additional number that would be required on account of this population of old soldiers?

Mr. ROGERS. The Provost Marshal General handed down a ruling, I think within a few days—certainly I have heard of it only within that time—that in a case such as the gentleman cites, or in a case where there is a large number of inmates of a penal or other public institution, the inmates may be credited to the State or town of their origin, in order to relieve the town where the institution happens to be of the tremendous burden which would result if they were included; but, as I said to the gentleman from Wisconsin, my impression is that the administrative work involved will be so great that we are quite likely to find that precisely the outcome of which the gentleman speaks will result in the case to which he refers, even although under the law and under the ruling of the Provost Marshal General it could probably be avoided if there were time and inclination on the part of the officials to do so.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Some weeks ago we authorized our allies to enlist their nationals in this country. Has the gentleman made any investigation as to whether there is any progress in the lessening of our alien population in that direction?

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, I think that the volunteering campaign conducted by the agents of the allies in the United States—and it necessarily was wholly a volunteering campaign, as the gentleman understands, under the law which we passed—barely scratched the surface. The merest trifle in number has been raised by recruiting during the campaign conducted in the large cities of the United States. But the gentleman's question leads me naturally to the part of the discussion upon which I now wish to embark.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he believes it would be constitutional for the Congress to pass an act enabling our allies to conscript their citizens here?

Mr. ROGERS. I think it would.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

A bill has been introduced by myself, which is now pending before the Committee on Immigration, to require within a certain time the ally aliens—that is, the aliens from the allied countries—to either take out their first papers, so as to become subject to military service, or else be deported. If that bill receives favorable action of Congress, would not that to a great extent relieve the situation? It may be possible that it could not now, because we may not get it through in time, but it could be as speedily considered as the amendment the gentleman suggests; and would not that be a solution of the difficulty?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the gentleman's bill; and, of course, we all recognize that it, if enacted, and without expressing any opinion as to its advisability, would go far to meet the situation with which I have been dealing.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. LONERGAN. Has the gentleman discovered through the Census Bureau the number of aliens that would be subject to the draft—that is, aliens who are between the ages of 21 and 31 years—who are now in the country?

Mr. ROGERS. I shall develop that immediately, if the gentleman will permit me to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. LONERGAN. I am very much interested in the gentleman's discussion and favor what he proposes.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the gentleman's question will be answered in just a moment, and if not, I shall be glad to yield again.

Mr. LONERGAN. Just one more question. Is there any sort of a treaty agreement that we have with our allies that would make it impossible at this time, without permission of our allies, to act——

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will permit me, I am immediately starting upon a portion of my remarks that deals directly with that question also.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. If the gentleman will permit me. I am deeply interested in this discussion, and there has come to me a thought that there might be a resultant inequality in the man power that would be left in each community in case the amendment the gentleman suggests is passed. Say, suppose in those communities there is a chance of one out of two being taken——

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. If this should be adjusted, would it not be true that the community would have a larger relative number of workmen left in it than in other communities?

Mr. ROGERS. It would not be true, however, if the aliens were included in military service.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. No; not if they were included in military service.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I am anxious to proceed, as my time is running out.

It must have been apparent to anyone who has followed these remarks that the basic cause of most of the difficulties to which I have called attention is the presence of aliens in this country scattered in unequal proportions among the several States of the Union. The question naturally arises whether these men who are living in the United States, enjoying its protection and privileges, earning good wages and living happily and well, should be as a class automatically exempted from the obligation to help preserve and defend the Nation from which they have received so much. Many of them have lived here practically their whole life. Should they, because they have lacked sufficient interest or patriotic sentiment to acquire citizenship in the United States, be given at this time a special privilege not enjoyed by their neighbors, who have realized their obligation to become citizens of the United States? Should they, while their neighbors are being called out to fight for the preservation of the Nation, be permitted to step into the berths thus left vacant and enrich themselves at the expense of those who are rendering patriotic service in the armed forces of the United States? The law prescribes that the draft—shall be based upon liability to military service of all male persons, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive * * *

Thus the law as it now stands specifically exempts all aliens except declarants who are not alien enemies. Should the law be changed?

There are at least 10 treaties between the United States and other countries still in force which prevent our subjecting aliens of those countries to military service. The most important of these in the present connection are Italy, Japan, and Spain. In Appendix D, printed as a part of my remarks, I have collected some of the treaty provisions bearing upon this inquiry. But even in the absence of treaty difficulties, have we the right to exact compulsory military service of aliens? Probably we have a bare and qualified right, aside from treaty stipulations, to impress for military service aliens within our territory, but we have exercised it very sparingly in the past, and except in case of necessity, much trouble would doubtless result from an attempt to exercise it at this time. In Appendix E I have collected and commented upon some of the precedents which bear upon the question.

There remains to be considered the question whether those who, though still aliens, have declared their intention to become citizens, are to be treated differently from aliens who have not declared their intention to become citizens. Following the precedent of the Civil War conscription act, the selective-draft law of May 18, 1917, as we have seen, authorizes the inclusion of "male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens." In spite of this direct provision of the law, I am unofficially informed that it is the intention of the Secretary of War to exempt declarants for citizenship from the obligation to render military service. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 12, page 3488, Senator CALDER made a statement which I have not seen denied:

The War Department advises me they do not intend to include aliens who have taken out their first papers.

And Senator LODGE, page 3489, stated:

It is the intention of the War Department to take no alien residents, whether they have declared their intention to become citizens or whether they have not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I should much prefer to proceed——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to state that I went to Provost Marshal Gen. Crowder and asked about it, and he told me they were going to take them.

Mr. ROGERS. I can not make out possibly——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It will upset everything in a city like New York if they do not take them.

Mr. ROGERS. Was that within a few days?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Immediately after the appearance of Senator CALDER'S remarks in the RECORD on Saturday I went over to Gen. Crowder and asked about the matter, and I was told they were going to take them.

Mr. ROGERS. I have been told explicitly within a few days, not, however, by Gen. Crowder, that it was not the intention of the War Department to take alien declarants.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It would be very unfortunate for the cities.

Mr. BURNETT. How can they fail to do it when the positive requirement of the law we passed requires it to be done?

Mr. ROGERS. That is a very pertinent inquiry; I do not know the answer.

Without considering at this time whether, if the War Department is correctly quoted, it has the right under the explicit language of the selective-draft law just quoted to exempt declarants for citizenship, it is proper to say that the War Department is probably impelled to this course by the fear of complications resulting from the treaty stipulations to which I have previously adverted. In the case of citizens of countries with which we have no treaties covering this point the difficulties are less obvious. The course of a government in behalf of its nationals who have taken out their first papers for citizenship in the United States can not accurately be forecasted. In the Civil War Great Britain secured of the United States permission on behalf of its citizens who had declared for United States citizenship the right to leave the country within 65 days, coupled with the authorization to the United States that it might validly impress into the military service those who did not take advantage of the permission thus granted to leave the country. I have collected in Appendix F some of the precedents which show the course of this country and other countries in respect to the impressment of aliens who have taken out their first papers for citizenship.

But these considerations of treaty stipulation and international law and comity, while no doubt of great practical importance, do not in the least modify the obvious unfairness of exempting from military service all aliens within the borders of the United States, whether or not declarants for citizenship. Figures furnished by the Provost Marshal General show that a total of 1,239,259 aliens registered on June 5. This large total is rather more than one-eighth of the total registration of 9,666,078. In addition to these aliens there were 111,760 alien enemies also registered. I have not been able to learn how many declarants for citizenship registered, as citizens and declarants were tabulated together, and no separation has been made. It is fair to say, however, that between 1,500,000 and 2,000,000 aliens of one or another of the three classes of aliens registered on June 5. This, it will be observed, is 15 to 20 per cent of the total.

Let us assume, without deciding, that it will not be practicable at present, at least, to utilize for military service the citizens of countries other than those with which the United States is making common cause in the war. Can any good reason be adduced why the citizens of countries which are fighting Germany to-day should not, if of proper age and if otherwise available, be required to render military service somewhere? It perhaps does not make very much difference, so far as inherent justice goes, whether these men are required to serve in the armed forces of their own country or in the armed forces of the United States. Clearly, they should be required to serve somewhere.

Just how numerous the citizens or subjects of the allied powers now within the United States in fact are, it is difficult to ascertain with any degree of accuracy. The census of 1910 shows that there were then 13,515,886 foreign-born in the United States. An examination of the countries of origin shows that over 7,000,000 of these emigrated from countries now at war with Germany. In other words, about 55 per cent of all foreign born originated in the allied countries. It seems probable that this same percentage would, approximately at least, be maintained in the case of the aliens who registered on June 5. If this is true, and if between 1,500,000 and 2,000,000 aliens registered on June 5, somewhere between 825,000 and 1,100,000 of these were nationals of the allies. Why should not they fight in behalf of the cause both of their country of origin and their adopted country? I think no fair man will be able to say. Further, it would seem as if the allied countries, even if we have treaty stipulations with some of them, would unanimously and cordially, if the suggestion were made, permit us during the pendency of the present war to include these persons or such part of them as we might desire within the armed forces of the United States. The numbers are large, and, as the war goes on, may prove to be a mighty and even a determinative factor in the result. Further, as I said earlier in my remarks, it is of great importance in a great war that the spirit of fairness and equality be everywhere observed. If I am not mistaken, our citizens will, almost without exception, deeply resent the accidental exemption from any military obligation of their alien neighbors. For the sake, then, of our military effectiveness and for the sake of our national morale, some reasonable and equitable solution should be achieved. I have prepared and introduced in Congress a resolution requesting the Secretary of State to take up with the allied governments the whole matter, with a view to securing consent for the inclusion of the available nationals of those countries in the armed forces of the United States. (Appendix G.)

And the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], the chairman of the Immigration Committee, proposes a plan which perhaps goes still further; to reach all subjects of the allies, so that the slackers shall do their duty somewhere.

I can not too often repeat that our duty as a Nation is to win this war. One of the ways in which we can strengthen ourselves for the combat is to see to it that our laws and the operation of our laws do justice to all. We have no selfish interest in this struggle; we are simply seeking as a Nation to make the world a better place in which to live. It is for us to keep our own house in order and ourselves to do that justice which we are preparing with our life's blood to exact from others. [Applause.]

APPENDIX B.

A bill (H. R. 5289) to amend section 2 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided, shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, or if and whenever the President decides that they can not effectually be so raised or maintained, then by selective draft; and all other forces hereby authorized, except as provided in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively; but this provision shall not prevent the transfer to any force of training cadres from other forces. Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof liable under this act to military service, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard. All persons drafted into the service of the United States and all officers accepting commissions in the forces herein provided for shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, except as to promotions, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to persons whose permanent retention in the military service on the active or retired list is not contemplated by existing law, and those drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That the President is authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment or draft, as herein provided, special and technical troops as he may deem necessary, and to embody them into organizations and to officer them as provided in the third paragraph of section 1 and section 9 of this act. Organizations of the forces herein provided for, except the Regular Army and the divisions authorized in the seventh paragraph of section 1, shall, as far as the interests of the service permit, be composed of men who come, and of officers who are appointed from, the same State or locality."

The most pronounced discrepancies appear for Washington, in which the registration amounted to 49.8 per cent of the estimate; for Oregon, in which it was 57.9 per cent; for North Dakota, with 73 per cent; for Wyoming, for which the report, with three precincts missing, indicates a registration of about 65 per cent of the estimate; for Nevada, with 71.6 per cent; and for South Dakota, with 72.1 per cent. In no other State was the registration less than 75 per cent of the estimate. On the other hand, 14 States—Arizona, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, Montana, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, and Wisconsin—exceeded their estimates, the greatest percentages of excess being those for Michigan, 29.4; Connecticut 29.3; Montana, 20.4; and Ohio, 14.4.

Estimates of population for the several States and the District of Columbia, for counties, and for cities of over 30,000 made by the Bureau of the Census of the Department of Commerce, July 1, 1917, in pursuance of and for the purpose mentioned in section 2 of an act of Congress "To authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

[The estimates for cities of 30,000 and over are excluded from those for the counties in which such cities are located.]

PREFACE.

The estimates of population contained herein relate to cities which, according to the official estimates of population made by the Bureau of the Census prior to the registration of June 5, 1917, had more than 30,000 inhabitants, and to counties or portions of counties which lie outside of such cities (except in the cases of Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island, for which States the estimates are made by "divisions," each of which consists of a number of towns)—that is to say, the figures given for any county or division are exclusive of the population of any city or cities having more than 30,000 inhabitants which are situated in that county or division. The name of each city is indented under that of the county in which it is located.

These estimates have been made by the Bureau of the Census, at the request of the Provost Marshal General of the War Department, solely for use as a basis for the apportionment of the forthcoming draft. The method employed may be described briefly as follows:

The total registration as shown by the preliminary telegraphic returns, 9,659,382, was divided by the total population of Continental United States exclusive of Alaska, as heretofore estimated by the Census Bureau, 103,635,300, in order to obtain the proportion which the registrants represented of the total population. The resulting figure, 9.32 per cent, was assumed to represent the proportion which the registrants in each geographical unit represented of the total population thereof. Since the State totals, as shown by the corrected returns received by mail, varied more or less from those given in the preliminary telegraphic returns, both the total registration for the United States and the total population estimated herein differ slightly from the figures above given.

The assumption that the proportion which the registrants in any county or city represent of its total population is the same throughout the United States may not be true, but the only way to ascertain the true proportion for each geographical unit would be to make an actual enumeration of its population. The proportion in 1910 varied considerably in different parts of the country, being greater as a rule in the newer than in the older sections and greater in cities than in rural localities. Because of the abnormal shiftings of population which have taken place among certain parts of the country in recent years, and particularly since the outbreak of the war gave so great an impetus to the manufacture of munitions and other commodities needed by the belligerents, the proportions which men 21 to 30 years of age, inclusive, represent of the total population of many localities have changed greatly since 1910. For this reason the assumption that the proportions existing in 1910 still prevail would result in very inaccurate estimates for some localities.

Since, therefore, it was impossible in any event to estimate precisely the population of cities, counties, and States on the basis of the registration, the simplest and speediest method—that based on the assumption that the proportion which the registrants represent of the total population is the same throughout the country—was adopted. One reason for the employment of this method was that the Census Bureau had only a very short time in which to prepare the estimates; but another, and still more cogent, reason was that in this manner there was obtained the fairest possible basis for the apportionment of the draft, since the localities whose population estimates may be exaggerated are those in which there is an excess of men 21 to 30 years of age, inclusive, while the ones whose population is understated are those in which the proportion of men of these ages is smaller than the average.

Although substantially complete telegraphic returns have been received for all States, the returns for a great many cities and counties, which should have reached the office of the Provost Marshal General by mail before this time, are still missing. Telegraphic requests were made for the totals for these missing counties and cities, but some of the replies were not received in time to make use of them in compiling these estimates. It was necessary, therefore, in the cases of most of the cities and counties for which the returns were still missing, to make the estimates on the assumption that the ratio between actual and estimated registration in these places was the same as that prevailing in localities comparable in size and, so far as was known, in other respects, for which returns had been received.

The names of cities and counties for which returns were received too late to be used in computing the estimates are indicated by footnotes.

The estimates for Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, in which the registration has not yet taken place, were made in the same manner in which the official estimates of population have been made by the Census Bureau heretofore, namely, on the assumption that the annual numerical increase in each geographical unit since 1910 has been the same as the average numerical increase between 1900 and 1910.

APPENDIX D.

PROVISIONS IN TREATIES ENTERED INTO BY THE UNITED STATES WITH OTHER COUNTRIES RELATING TO RIGHT OF EITHER COUNTRY TO EXACT COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE OF CITIZENS OF THE OTHER COUNTRY RESIDING THEREIN.

Article 10 of the treaty between the United States and the Argentine Confederation (1853) provides in part as follows: "The citizens of the United States residing in the Argentine Confederation and the citizens of the Argentine Confederation residing in the United States shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whatsoever, whether by sea or by land."

The treaty between the United States and the Independent State of the Congo (1891), article 3: "The citizens and inhabitants of each of the high contracting parties shall be exempt in the territories of the other from all personal service in the Army, Navy, or militia, and from all pecuniary contributions in lieu of such."

The treaty between the United States and the Republic of Costa Rica (1851), article 9, provides: "The citizens of the United States residing in the Republic of Costa Rica and the citizens of the Republic of Costa Rica residing in the United States shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whatsoever, either by sea or by land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and the Dominican Republic (1871) terminated January 13, 1898, on notice from the Dominican Government, article 2, provides: "The citizens of each of the high contracting parties residing or established in the territory of the other shall be exempt from all compulsory military service by sea or by land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and France (1788), abrogated by act of Congress of July 7, 1798, article 14, provides: "The subjects of the Most Christian King and the citizens of the United States who shall prove by legal evidence that they are of the said nations, respectively, shall in consequence enjoy an exemption from all personal service in the place of their settlement."

The treaty between the United States and the Republic of Haiti (1864), denounced by Haiti to take effect May 7, 1905, article 5, provides: "The citizens of each of the high contracting parties residing or established in the territory of the other shall be exempt from all compulsory military duty by sea or by land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and the Republic of Honduras (1864), article 9, provides: "The citizens of the United States residing in the Republic of Honduras and the citizens of the Republic of Honduras residing in the United States shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whatsoever, either by sea or by land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and His Majesty the King of Italy (1871), article 3, provides in part: "The citizens of each of the high contracting parties shall * * * be exempt in their respective territories from compulsory military service, either on land or sea, in the regular forces, or in the national guard, or in the militia."

The treaty between the United States of America and the Emperor of Japan (1894)—superseded by the treaty of 1911, infra—article 1, provides: "The citizens or subjects of either of the contracting parties residing in the territories of the other shall be exempt from all compulsory military service whatsoever, whether in the army, navy, national guard, or militia; from all contributions imposed in lieu of personal service; and from all forced loans or military exactions or contributions."

The treaty between the United States and the Emperor of Japan (1911), article 1, provides: "The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall * * * be exempt in the territories of the other from compulsory military service either on land or sea, in the regular forces, or in the national guard, or in the militia; from all contributions imposed in lieu of personal service; and from all forced loans or military exactions or contributions."

The treaty between the United States and the United Mexican States (1831)—terminated in 1881 by virtue of notice given by Mexico—article 9, provides: "The citizens of both countries, respectively, shall be exempt from compulsory service in the Army or Navy."

The treaty between the United States and Paraguay (1859), article 11, provides: "The citizens of the United States of America residing in the territories of the Republic of Paraguay, and the citizens of the Republic of Paraguay residing in the United States of America, shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whatsoever, whether by sea or land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and Serbia (1881), article 4, provides: "Citizens of the United States in Serbia and Serbian subjects in the United States shall be reciprocally exempted from all personal service, whether in the army by land or by sea; whether in the national guard or militia; from billeting; from all contributions, whether pecuniary or in kind, destined as a compensation for personal service; from all forced loans, and from all military exactions or requisitions."

The treaty between the United States and Spain (1902), article 5, provides: "The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall be exempt in the territories of the other from all compulsory military service, by land or sea, and from all pecuniary contributions in lieu of such, as well as from all obligatory official functions whatsoever."

The treaty between the United States and Tonga (1886), article 9, provides: All citizens of the United States residing in the Tonga Islands, and Tongan subjects residing in the United States, shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whether by sea or land, and from all forced loans, military requisitions, and quartering of troops."

The treaty between the United States and the two Sicilies—rendered obsolete by the consolidation of the two Sicilies with the Kingdom of Italy in 1861—article 5, provides: "The citizens or subjects of one of the high contracting parties, travelling or residing in the territories of the other, shall be free from all military service, whether by land or sea, from all billeting of soldiers in their houses, from every extraordinary contribution, not general and by law established, and from all forced loans."

The treaty between the United States and Venezuela (1860)—terminated in 1870 pursuant to notice from Venezuela—article 2, provides: "The citizens of each of the high contracting parties, residing or established in the territory of the other, shall be exempt from all compulsory military service by sea or by land, and from all forced loans or military exactions or requisitions."

It will thus be seen that in at least 17 treaties entered into between the United States and foreign governments the policy of mutual exemption from compulsory military service of the citizens or subjects of one of the contracting parties, residing in the territories of the other, has been established. At least 10 of these treaties are still in full force and effect.

The following treaties between the United States and other countries contain a "most-favored-nation" clause which would probably be deemed to include a similar exemption from compulsory military service even if not otherwise existing by treaty or by international law:

Algiers, 1816, article 12.
China, 1858, article 30.
Korea, 1882, article 14.
Hanseatic Republic, 1827, article 9.
Japan, 1854, article 9.
Morocco, 1880, article 17.
Persia, 1856, article 3.
Samoan Islands, 1878, article 6.
Spain, 1902, article 2.
Tonga, 1886, article 3.
Japan, 1911, article 4.

NOTE.—Several of the above treaties have been abrogated or been rendered obsolete; and several of the "most-favored-nation" clauses are, in this particular connection, rendered unnecessary by inclusion in the same treaty of a specific exemption against the imposition of compulsory military service by either country upon the citizens or subjects of the other.

APPENDIX E.

MAY THE UNITED STATES, EVEN WHEN TREATY STIPULATIONS DO NOT PREVENT, EXACT COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE OF ALIENS?

Under this head, for the purposes of this phase of the discussion, I define "alien" to mean a citizen of some country other than the United States who has not in the United States declared his intention to become a citizen thereof. I shall later consider the availability for compulsory military service of an alien who has so declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States.

The precedents of this and other countries show some confusion as to the right of a nation to exact military service of the citizen of another who is domiciled or temporarily residing within its territories.

I shall first set forth some of the precedents which deny the right; then those which assert, at least qualifiedly, the right; and finally attempt to indicate what seems to be the true rule.

In 1804 Mr Madison, then Secretary of State, wrote to Mr. Monroe, then our Minister to England: "Citizens or subjects of one country residing in another, though bound by their temporary allegiance to many common duties, can never be rightfully forced into military service * * *."

Naturally many cases involving the question arose during the Civil War. Secretary Seward had occasion to express himself a number of times. In 1862 he said: "I can hardly suppose that there exists anywhere in the world the erroneous belief that aliens are liable here to military duty". Later the same year he wrote to the governor of Indiana: "There is no principle more distinctly and clearly settled in the law of nations than the rule that resident aliens not naturalized are not liable to perform military service. We have uniformly claimed and insisted upon it in our intercourse with foreign nations." In 1864 he wrote to Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War: "In a case of alleged fraudulent enlistment of an alien his Government has an undoubted right and duty to ask for a prompt investigation and satisfactory answer; and if it appears that he was improperly enlisted and be has fallen in battle, his family ought to have some compensation." In Halleck's International Law it is stated: "In 1861, during the American Civil War, the British Government declared that if enforced enlistments of British subjects for the war were persisted in, the Government would be obliged to concert with other neutral powers for the protection of their respective subjects, but neither in the Northern or Southern States was the discharge of any British subject enlisted against his will refused on proper representation." (Vol. 2, p. 6.)

In 1874 Secretary Fish wrote: "We did not claim the right to impress aliens into our forces during the late Civil War, but it is understood that in one instance at least, in the case of a siege, we sought to justify such an impressment."

The United States has been very positive indeed in its action when Mexico has sought to impose military service upon citizens of the United States. The most notable cases, however, occurred in 1880, at the time when the treaty of 1831, forbidding compulsory military service, was still in force. The American authorities, however, appear to have put their protest upon grounds of international law as well as upon treaty obligations. The American minister to Mexico was instructed that there was "scarcely any act of which a nation should be less tolerant than that of a neighboring power forcibly impressing its citizens into their military service, perhaps to be obliged, at some future time, to fight against their own flag." Mr. Evarts later in the same year wrote that whenever protest was made by Mexico during our Civil War, it was the practice of the State Department to bring the subject at once to the attention of the Secretary of War, and that "no single instance is met with in which the Mexican citizen's claim to exemption from military service in the armies of the United States was not promptly recognized and respected by this Government." The following year Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, wrote: "It is notorious that the impressment of American seamen into the naval service of a foreign power was at one time a serious grievance, not to be acquiesced in, and raised a question upon which all parties in this country were unanimous in regarding as one of international character. Public sentiment here in regard to that subject was borne in mind during the late Civil War. The number of persons of foreign birth, especially in the large cities, led to the accidental or involuntary enrollment of unnaturalized aliens in the military or naval service. These, however, as is shown by the large space in the records of the department at the time, were at once discharged upon complaint made and in the absence of proof of their naturalization. It is hoped, therefore, that in considering this subject the Mexican Government will not only have due regard to the unlawfulness of the impressment, but to the universal and strong sentiment upon the subject which pervades this country."

In 1888 Mr. Bayard summed up the situation thus: "It is well settled by international law that foreigners temporarily resident in a country can not be compelled to enter into its permanent military service. It is true that in times of social disturbance or of invasion their services in police or home guards may be exacted, and that they may be required to take up arms to help in the defense of their place of residence against the invasion of savages, pirates, etc., as a means of warding off some great public calamity by which all would suffer indiscriminately. The test in each case, as to whether a foreigner can properly be enrolled against his will, is that of necessity. Unless social order and immunity from attack by uncivilized tribes can not be secured except through the enrollment of such a force, a nation has no right to call upon foreigners for assistance against their will."

So much for the cases in which the propriety of exacting military service has been negatived. Let me now cite a few cases where the right, at least, whatever the considerations of comity and reciprocity, was maintained. Secretary Seward, in 1868, wrote: "This Government is not disposed to draw in question the right of a nation in a case of extreme necessity to enroll in the military forces all persons within its territories, whether citizens or domiciled foreigners."

The following year Secretary Fish wrote: "This Government, though waiving the exercise of the right to require military service from all residents, has never surrendered that right, and can not object if other governments insist upon it." And again in 1871 Secretary Fish wrote: "I must decline to enter into the question to what extent and under what circumstances do our citizens, native or naturalized (in the absence of treaty stipulations), owe military service to a foreign government in whose dominions they are domiciled for commercial or other purposes. They certainly do not stand on the same footing as mere travelers or temporary sojourners."

Assistant Secretary Davis in 1873 wrote: "There is no treaty stipulation between the United States and Great Britain which exempts the citizens or subjects of either party from military duty in the forces of the other, either in peace or war. Consequently we can not claim such exemption as a matter of right. As a matter of comity and reciprocity, however, we certainly can claim them."

Although it will be observed that there is some conflict of opinion indicated in the above extracts (oftentimes doubtless to be partially or wholly explained by the nature of the correspondence or the addressee of the letter), the general rule would seem to be that in the absence of treaty stipulation a country has the right to impress for military service those within its territory, even though citizens of another power. But this right is on grounds of comity and reciprocity to be exercised sparingly, because almost certain to be followed by urgent representations by the government of the citizen concerned. Only in case of urgent necessity and for service coterminous in time and nature with the necessity will enforced military service willingly be tolerated without protest by the other government. The right, then, exists, but its exercise is so fraught with difficulty that without the express and explicit consent of the other government concerned it is doubtful if this exercise would often be wise.

APPENDIX F.

MAY THE UNITED STATES, EVEN WHEN TREATY STIPULATIONS DO NOT PREVENT, EXACT COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE OF ALIENS WHO HAVE DECLARED THEIR INTENTION TO BECOME CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES?

Revised Statutes of the United States, section 2165, provides in part as follows: "An alien * * * shall declare on oath * * * two years at least prior to his admission that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty, * * *."

It will be observed from the language of the above statute that a declarant for citizenship neither takes a present oath of allegiance to the United States nor disclaims allegiance to the country of his origin. It would seem natural to expect, therefore, that the authorities would regard his citizenship status as absolutely unaffected and would settle the question of his liability to compulsory service exactly as if he had never taken even the first step toward becoming a citizen of the United States.

Mr. Seward wrote to the governor of Indiana in 1862: "The law of Great Britain holds that a native British subject owes allegiance to the British Government until he has completely effected his naturalization in the United States under the laws of Congress. * * * From the foundation of the Government the Department (of State) had refused to grant passports as citizens to aliens who had merely filed the preliminary declaration of intention and who had not effected their naturalization under the United States laws, and had informally recognized the passports granted to them by the proper authorities of the governments of which they had been born subjects."

In 1863 Mr. Seward stated the rule as follows: "No alien-born person is liable to render military service unless either he has been naturalized on his own application or has made a voluntary declaration, on oath, of his intention to become a citizen by naturalization according to law, or has claimed and actually exercised the political right of voting as a citizen of the United States."

While this language does not expressly state that a declarant is liable to render compulsory military service, it evidently squints in this direction. Doubtless Mr. Seward, in writing it, had in mind the language of the act of Congress of March 3, 1863—the conscription act—which expressly declared that the levy should include "all persons of foreign birth who shall have declared, on oath, their intentions to become citizens."

In 1863 certain able-bodied male persons of foreign birth, who had declared, on oath, their intentions to become American citizens, were called upon for military duty by the United States. The British Government suggested that British subjects who had merely declared their intention to become American citizens but had not exercised any political franchise in consequence of such declaration ought to be allowed a reasonable period after the passing of the act to exercise the option of leaving the United States or of continuing residing therein with the annexed conditions. The United States Government thereupon allowed 65 days to such persons to exercise their option, and the British Government refused to interfere on behalf of any intended citizens who had not availed themselves of the opportunity. (Parliamentary Papers, 1863, No. 337.)

By the act of March 3, 1863, aliens who had made a declaration of intention and who were under specified conditions liable to military duty were permitted to obtain passports, but this privilege was repealed in 1866. Switzerland objected to President Lincoln's proclamation concerning the liability of Swiss in the United States to perform military service. Mr. Seward suggested that a just interpretation of the war measures of Congress constituted a new and additional law of Federal naturalization. "But," he adds, "it was foreseen that some emigrants who had declared their intention might complain of surprise if they were immediately subjected to conscription. To guard against this surprise the proclamation was issued, giving them ample notice of the change of the law, with the alternative of removal from this country if they should prefer removal to remaining here on the footing on which Congress had brought them. Surely no foreigner has a right to be naturalized and remain here in a time of public danger and enjoy the protection of the Government without submitting to general requirements needful for his own security."

In Moore's Digest of International Law, volume 3, pages 336 to 353, will be found the precedents conclusively establishing that the declaration of intention to become a citizen neither confers citizenship in the United States nor divests citizenship in the country of origin.

It will be seen from this review of the authorities that the status of a declarant for citizenship is legally in no way different from that of an alien who has not made declaration. But it is natural that the country of origin should feel somewhat less interested and concerned in behalf of the former than of the latter. He has shown his wish to throw off his old allegiance, and there is no very evident reason why the mother country should go out of her way to protect him. As we have seen, there is a right, aside from treaty stipulations, to impress any alien into the military service of the country where he has gone to reside. This right is controlled by considerations of comity. But in the case of a declarant the considerations of comity are, for the reasons just indicated, much weaker. Therefore it follows naturally that military service is more likely to be successfully exacted of an alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen than of an alien who has not so declared. Great Britain in the precedent cited above doubtless did her full duty in securing for her citizens, declarants for American citizenship, a period of 65 days within which to leave the United States on pain of being subjected to military service if they remained. It is doubtful if any country would do more to-day; many might do less.

The recently enacted selective-draft law (an "act of Congress to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, sec 2) follows the selective-draft law of the Civil War by including in the liability to military service "male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens." No good reason is perceived why at least a contingent liability—conditioned, perhaps, upon their preferring to remain in this country after opportunity to leave has been afforded them—should not be exacted of these declarants.

Of course, it should be understood that this suggestion is predicated upon the absence of any treaty stipulation, effective and unwaived, standing in the way.

APPENDIX G.

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 115) requesting the Secretary of State to open diplomatic negotiations with certain Governments with a view to obtaining their approval and sanction for action by the United States permitting the inclusion in the armed forces of the United States of such citizens of the countries of such Governments as are within the United States.

Whereas by section 2 of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, and entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," it is provided that the draft "shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies, who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive"; and

Whereas the effect of this provision will be to exempt from military service all aliens except those who, not being alien enemies, have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States; and

Whereas under the principles of international law, the treaties of the United States, and the rules and precedents established for many years by the Department of State of the United States the right of the United States to require military service of the nationals of other nations, whether or not declarants for United States citizenship, may be questioned by those nations; and

Whereas it is reported that the President, in order to avoid the raising of any question by other nations, will, notwithstanding the provisions of said act of May 18, 1917, cause to be exempted from military service under said act those aliens also who have declared their intention to become citizens; and

Whereas in a report to the Senate of the United States, dated June 22, 1917, the Secretary of War has stated that the registration prescribed by said act of May 18, 1917, discloses that 1,239,179 persons who have not declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and who are not citizens of a country with which the United States is at war, so registered on June 5, 1917, which number is over one-eighth of all who registered; and

Whereas a large number of persons who, not being citizens of the United States, have declared their intention to become citizens, also registered on June 5, 1917; and

Whereas under the law and under the reported decision of the President no person of the 1,239,179 and no one of the large number of declarants for citizenship will be held to military service, although all of them have, in many cases for many years, enjoyed the privileges and protection of citizens of the United States; and

Whereas a large number of these persons are citizens of countries at war with a country with which the United States is at war; and

Whereas because of their present residence such persons are enabled to avoid military service against the enemy of the United States for which they would otherwise be liable or available; and

Whereas it is repugnant to justice and equity that such persons should be wholly exempted from military service while citizens of the United States are held to military service: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to open diplomatic negotiations with the Governments of the several countries at war with a country with which the United States is at war with a view to obtaining their approval and sanction for action by the United States looking to the imposition upon such citizens of those countries as are within the United States of the liability to and performance of military service in the armed forces of the United States during the continuance of the present war between the United States and Germany, and to report to the Congress of the United States as soon as practicable the result of such negotiations.

APPENDIX H.

I append resolutions dated July 10, 1917, signed by Mr. E. W. Dunbar, chairman of the committee on public safety of Hudson, Mass., which read as follows:

"The committee on public safety for the town of Hudson have adopted the following resolutions, which are meant to convey to you the general feeling of the citizens of this town:

"Whereas a certain class of aliens have forced our citizens to believe that they are planning to profit at the expense of our young men when the latter have been drawn away from their positions to military duty; and

"Whereas all aliens who have received in the past the benefits of this free Government of ours ought now to expect to do their part in the maintenance and preservation of those democratic principles upon which our Government is founded and for which the present world war is being waged; and

"Whereas under existing laws or conditions these same aliens are not required to make the sacrifices demanded of the young men of the United States: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That we, the undersigned citizens of the town of Hudson, respectfully ask you, our Representative in Congress, to urge the passage of such laws as may in your judgment be necessary to remedy the injustice described above."

Also, a letter recently published from Mayor Hurley of Lawrence, which deals with the general question which I have been considering:

"DEAR SIR: The citizens of Lawrence are quite generally convinced that the expressed intention to make population the basis for the proposed draft of young men for military service will be a great injustice to Lawrence. The exclusion of aliens from the draft will inevitably cause Lawrence to furnish a larger quota in proportion to population than almost any city or town in the country. As you know, the proportion of aliens in this city is very high, and it is especially true of young men between the ages of 21 and 31, because between these ages a man is most likely to emigrate

"It seems to me that the young men of Lawrence, although as patriotic as any, and willing to bear their share of the burdens, should not be called on to bear more than their just share. I sincerely hope you will enter a protest to the President and his advisers and try to have some method which will be more equitable for cities having a large foreign population.

"I might suggest that if the basis used was citizenship or citizens and declarants, it would be a fairer system for Lawrence. If it is possible to accomplish anything in this matter, I am sure the people of Lawrence will gratefully appreciate it.

"Very sincerely, yours,

"JOHN J. HURLEY."

And finally an extract from a letter which I have within a day or two received from a constituent:

"I am taking the liberty of writing as I thought you might be interested to know the views of some of your constituents in regard to the present situation. I hear many favorable comments on the bill which you introduced to allow the conscription of the citizens of our allies who are living here and are not eligible for the United States draft.

"Many of the young men who are subject to draft have expressed the opinion that it was unfair to them to allow all these other men to enjoy the advantages of this country without being eligible for service either in this or their own country, and I feel sure that it will create a much better feeling among the men eligible for draft if some such bill is passed. It has been a frequent occurrence in this section for so-called foreigners to comfort the young men about to be drafted, or are at present serving in the militia or other military service, with remarks like that passed by a foreigner to a young militiaman I know, and this is typical of many such cases. He greeted him as follows: 'Hello, John! You go fight? That's good! By'n by I get your good job, go to your house, do anything I want.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order heretofore made the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether anybody here will be interested in what I am about to say. I have not decided exactly what I shall say, but I want to call the attention of the Democrats to the fact that when they came into power they promised a lower cost of living, and I think they will be willing now to agree that they have not produced the results which they promised; at any rate the people of the United States have long since learned that promises made by Democrats do not amount to much. I happened a few days ago to be favored with the receipt of a bill of fare, the menu card, of the Savoy Hotel, London, dated May 13, and on that bill of fare is printed a statement dated the 15th of April, 1917, that the number of courses allowed to be served at a meal are no longer to be limited. That gives evidence that there is no very great shortage of food in London. After reading over the bill of fare it occurred to me that it might be worth while to compare the cost of food served in the Savoy Hotel with the cost of food served in the Willard Hotel in this city, and, by the way, it may be stated for the information of the House, that the Savoy Hotel is one of the best hotels in the world. Its standard is at least as high as the Willard, and some say much higher. I looked over the menu and the prices of the Savoy with a view to comparing them with the Willard, and I find that it is not easy to compare the two because the bills of fare are not exactly alike, but there are several things on each bill of fare that are alike and I have tried to make a typical list of things as nearly alike as possible with the prices attached. For example, at the Willard Hotel they charge 90 cents for a lobster cocktail. Well, that is 3 cents worth of lobster and a little vinegar and some other sauces mixed to give the flavor. Then for cherrystone clams they charge 50 cents. I do not know, but I do not suppose the number of clams in the 50-cent order would cost them more than 1 cent. Then they charge 30 cents for olives. Well, I do not know how many olives they serve for 30 cents, but probably not to exceed three or four, and they certainly could not cost more than 3 or 4 cents.

Celery at the Willard costs 50 cents; celery at the Savoy costs 12 cents. At the Willard chicken broth is sold at 35 cents per portion; bread and butter is 15 cents; coffee, 25 cents; and tea 35 cents; Potomac bass is sold at 50 cents and sirloin steak at from $1.50 to $4.50.

Now, there is half a broiled duckling. Everybody knows that a duckling does not furnish any very great amount of food for a full-sized man. They charge $1.75 for that. Well, you can buy these ducklings, I suppose, for about 21 cents apiece—not to exceed 50 cents apiece at the outside. I would not think you would have to pay over 25 cents. So if you pay $1.75 for half a duckling, they would be getting at the rate of $3.50 for a thing for which they paid 25 cents. Of course, there is some expense attached to cooking and serving it.

Then they have a list of vegetables at the Willard. Lima beans are on the list. They charge you 60 cents for a service of lima beans—I suppose about three spoonsful, costing less than half a cent. French peas are 40 cents. I do not know what the duty is on them, but I suppose they come in on the free list under Democratic rule.

Cauliflower—one of these educated cabbages—is charged for at 50 cents a service. I would not give much for cauliflower myself. Perhaps other people would. But, at any rate, the 50 cents you pay for it at the Willard is paid for what would not cost them over a cent—at most not over 2 cents.

Mushrooms, 65 cents—for grilled mushrooms. They charge you 30 cents for potatoes. I do not know what they are selling for just now, but I think at about 65 cents a bushel on the market. Of course, last year they were selling at a high price, at about 80 cents apiece, as somebody from Maine or New Hampshire told me, and they raised about 80 to the acre, which would cause them to bring $64 an acre. It was not a bad crop at that.

Mr. AUSTIN. What Washington hotel would the gentleman commend or recommend?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not commending anything now. I am telling facts.

They have a crab salad, and they charge you a dollar down there for it; for chicken salad, another dollar; and lobster salad a dollar; and grapefruit salad, 50 cents. I do not know exactly what grapefruit costs this year, but my opinion is it is worth about 6 cents apiece. And if you get half a grape fruit put into a salad it costs you 50 cents.

And then they have dessert. They charge for French or German pancakes 50 cents. Now, everybody knows that the amount of flour that goes into a German pancake, or even a French pancake, would not cost over 3 or 4 cents. And it seems to me that 50 cents is an extraordinary price to pay. Then, there is strawberry shortcake at 50 cents. I do not know how many strawberries there are in it. Generally about half a dozen strawberries are found in a shortcake, and a little whipped cream, a little lightened flour mixed with baking powder, so that it will be swelled up a little, more or less, to make it appear large for the money. Then, they have fruits at the Willard. They charge you 50 cents for peaches. They give you two peaches to an order, and two peaches at the present rates on the market would be worth 5 cents.

Then, they have half a cantaloupe at 50 cents. You can buy cantaloupe at 6 cents now, not to exceed 8 cents. Blackberries, 50 cents—about four tablespoonfuls of blackberries.

Mr. AUSTIN. Has the gentleman had any trouble with the Willard people? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. No; no trouble. I do not go to the Willard. I can not afford to. I thought it was only fair to state the difference between the cost of living here and the cost abroad, where we send the food. We send it abroad. I am going to read the other side after I get through with this. Blackberries, 50 cents; cherries, 50 cents; and "grapefruit supreme," 75 cents. That is half a grapefruit with the meat within the shell cut out so that you will not have to waste your time or your energy to pick it out. Now, it seems to me that is an exorbitant price to pay.

Now, let me call your attention to the situation at the Savoy in London.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. On that last character of grapefruit, "the supreme," do they not have a red cherry on top of that? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. They do have something of that sort. [Laughter.] I suppose to lead the man who is in the habit of taking liquor with his meals to think he is getting a cocktail with a cherry in it.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the gentleman was manifestly unfair not to mention the cherry proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. Really I did not know enough about the situation until my colleague called attention to it. He is an expert. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. Not only that, but it suggests the gentleman has dined at the Willard. Most of us have not.

Mr. MADDEN. I fortunately had an invitation to the Willard from a friend of mine, who has more money than good judgment. There was another gentleman guest besides myself present. I do not know how much it cost for the dinner, but I saw the man who paid for it reach into his pocket and pull out first one roll of bills and then another, and then counting them out he had it stacked that high [indicating] when he handed them over to the waiter. I do not know what denominations they were.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Was the gentleman very hungry before he sat down?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I was not. We had but a very small dinner, served in three small courses. The first was frozen soup. It was not necessary to freeze it for me. I was chilly enough, anyhow. Next we had half a chicken; no potatoes. Then, I think, we had half a cantaloupe. But the number of bills that were paid to the waiter to settle the account was quite large. I do not know what the denominations of the bills were, of course, but it seemed to me the price was excessive, whatever the denominations of the bills.

Now, I notice that at the Savoy Hotel, in London, they serve a table d'hôte dinner, and that table d'hôte dinner costs 6s. and 6d. That is $1.62. You could not buy that dinner at the Willard Hotel for less than $5.

Here is a bill of fare for the table d'hôte at the Savoy: Cream soup; supreme of sole. Supreme of sole, of course, consists of the important meat in the fish, with all the bones taken out; nothing but the best part of the fish. Then comes chicken, after the sole, and artichoke, and bread and butter, and cheese, and coffee, all for $1.62.

We send most of this food over to London, and the London hotels are paying war taxes. Our hotels have not begun to pay war taxes yet. I do not know what their charges will be when they commence to pay war taxes, but I suppose they are getting the money now in advance, so that they will be able to pay the taxes when they are levied. [Laughter.]

Over there soup costs 24 cents. At the Willard it costs 35. That is not very much of a difference. Over there they charge 12 cents for celery, and here they charge 50 cents. I do not know whether we send the celery over there or not. I am inclined to think we do. I do not think they raise celery in England. They have to get it from some other place. Then I find that a small steak at the Savoy Hotel costs 36 cents. At the Willard it costs $1.50—quite a difference. We send the meat from Chicago over to the Savoy Hotel, and we send the meat from Chicago to the Willard Hotel. The people over there pay the same price for their meat to the Chicago packers as these people pay here, surely. They ought to pay more, but they sell for less. Then they have fish.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Does not the Savoy Hotel have the advantage of water rates in transportation?

Mr. MADDEN. We send the stuff from Chicago. You have got to send it first by land and then by water before it gets to the Savoy.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Is not a comparison of the prices between the Willard and the Savoy a little unfair, because about 65 per cent of what the Willard charges is for the style of the hotel?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no. The Savoy is much more aristocratic than the Willard, if you gentlemen knew it.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not know that. But I know something about the Willard.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, they have style at the Savoy, all right. I am sorry the gentleman got stung at the Willard.

Mr. HOWARD. I only went there once. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. How could the Savoy be more stylish than the Willard?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, the gentleman from Missouri never looks at anything but "Peacock Alley" when he goes to the Willard. I am talking about the dining room, not about "Peacock Alley." [Laughter.] Of course what they have in "Peacock Alley" is largely in full-dress uniform, and that consists of a large amount of paint and a small amount of clothes. [Laughter.]

Now we have vegetables. Over at the Savoy Hotel the first thing on the list is cauliflower. That costs 36 cents there, and here it costs 50 cents. There is not very much difference. They are both educated cabbage. Then over there they have kale, 36 cents. We have no kale on the Willard bill. At the Savoy they have mushrooms on toast, at 24 cents. Mushrooms at the Willard are 65 cents; quite a difference.

Mr. MEEKER. Is not that an error? Should it not be "mushroom," not "mushrooms"?

Mr. MADDEN. It is the same thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEEKER. It is only one mushroom.

Mr. MADDEN. No; they have more than one. Then over there they have cheese, per person, 12½ cents, and cheese here is 25 cents per person.

Mr. MEEKER. We have stronger cheese than they have. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Over there they charge 12 cents per person for coffee, and here they charge 25 cents. Roast chicken at the Savoy for four persons costs 10 shillings. That would be 60 cents per person. Then they have roast chicken over there for six persons. They charge 12 shillings for that. That reduces the price for each individual to 48 cents when six dine together. If six persons dine together over here on roast chicken, if the bill is not $30 you will be very lucky. [Laughter.]

Now, it seems to me that while we are agitating the high cost of living it might be quite appropriate for those who are to be placed in charge of the regulation of this very important matter to look after the prices. I do not know how much truth there is in the statement I have heard, or whether there is any truth in it. I am not going to make the statement on my own responsibility or with any idea that it is true, but I shall state it for what it is worth. I was told that Mr. Hoover suggested a short time ago that he intended to try to get the hotels of the United States to reduce the size of their portions about one-half. Somebody suggested to him that he ought to reduce the price for each portion one-half, and he said in reply that he was not concerned about the price. But the people of the United States are. They are anxious not so much for the reduction of the portion as they are for the reduction of the price. If we are to have any conservation of food, or any regulation, it must not be confined to the quantity of food that is to be consumed by each individual, but it must include also the regulation of the price.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. How are you going to regulate that without regulating the price of labor and the overhead cost of preparing that food and putting it before you?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, we will have to begin to live a simple life.

Mr. FOCHT. That does not answer the question.

Mr. MADDEN. How do they do it on the other side?

Mr. FOCHT. But that is not the point. You said nothing about the difference in the size of the portion, and nothing about what it costs at the Willard Hotel to put the food before you. That is just as important as the cost of the food.

Mr. MADDEN. You can not run a hotel in London much cheaper than you can in Washington.

Mr. FOCHT. Then what becomes of your argument about foreign labor and the protective tariff and high wages for American labor? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. That has nothing to do with the preparation of food in a hotel in London?

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that the tips given to the table waiters practically pay their salaries?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, that is in addition to what you pay for the food. The hotel does not pay that.

Mr. SIMS. The hotel does not pay the waiters. The patrons pay the waiters.

Mr. MADDEN. Every time you turn around in a hotel you have got to put your hand into your pocket to pay a waiter or somebody if you expect to get any service. I am not criticising the Willard Hotel any more than I am any other hotel. What I want to do is to call the attention of the people to the fact that there is a vast difference in the cost of food as supplied in the hotels in England and the hotels in America, and there ought to be something done to find out why England can afford to sell the food that we send there so much more cheaply than it is sold to us here.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FARR. Is there any regulation of prices over there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FARR. Would not that account for it?

Mr. MADDEN. It does to some extent. It ought to.

Mr. FARR. I talked with a merchant, who told me that he had not paid any more than $5.50 a barrel for any barrel of flour that he had sold, but that in selling he had gone up with the market price, and had obtained as high as $17 a barrel for the flour he sold.

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. FARR. Now, could that be done in England?

Mr. MADDEN. I think not. They compel the man to sell his first batch of flour at a price commensurate with the price he paid for the wheat he ground into the flour, and then when that batch of flour is gone, if he had to pay a higher price for his next lot of wheat, he could charge a corresponding price for the flour.

Mr. FARR. Does not that account in a measure for the difference in prices?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; for here the millers have put the wheat purchased by them at a low price and the wheat purchased at a high price into the mill, charging for the flour made therefrom on the basis of the higher-priced wheat and pocketing enormous profits on the lower-priced wheat at the expense of the working people of the country.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Hoover is just as anxious to reduce the cost of living as he is to conserve food.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope he is. It seems that England does not think there is any shortage of food, because while a long time ago they placed a limit on the number of courses that could be served at a meal, they have lifted that limit, so that there is now no limit.

Mr. FESS, Mr. LAGUARDIA, and Mr. HULBERT rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield first to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Regarding the suggestion of Mr. Hoover to reduce the size of the portion, if that should be carried out through all the industries, suppose the people of the country should save on the purchase of clothing and not buy anything more than would be necessary to get through this year, what effect would it have generally on the clothing business of the whole country?

Mr. MADDEN. That ought to make a surplus of clothing and reduce the price, in accordance with the law of supply and demand.

Mr. FESS. What effect would it have upon those who are in the business of making and selling clothes?

Mr. MADDEN. It would reduce the amount of their business and reduce the profits and might ruin the industry.

Mr. FESS. While I am in sympathy with much that has been said through the press, I have been wondering what would be the general effect on the ability of the country to carry on business and get ready to win the war if we should all obey specifically the suggestions that have been made recently about reducing the consumption of various articles.

Mr. MADDEN. What we ought to do is to live normally, not to live in such a way as to retard the progress of the country. We ought not to waste, and we ought not to try to be so saving that we will stop the wheels of progress.

Mr. FESS. I have wondered whether there are not a number of people in the country who have clothing in such amount that they would not necessarily have to buy a stitch for a year. What proportion of the population would that include, and what effect would it have upon the business of the country if we should stop buying?

Mr. MADDEN. It would put everybody in the clothing business, and a good many kindred businesses, into bankruptcy; but nobody is going to do that.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman, in giving the prices of food at a local hotel, made a statement of the cost of foodstuffs and it struck me that the prices he gave were remarkably low. I am sure that many people in New York will write me and ask me where the gentleman from Illinois does his marketing.

Mr. MADDEN. It is easy enough to find out the cost of these things. You can go through any wholesale place here or on the street and buy those things for less money than I have stated.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HULBERT. I wanted to ask whether the gentleman had noticed that while they are able to sell foodstuffs in England cheaper than they are here, and while we have been attempting, so far as this House is concerned, to conserve the grain supply to ship to the other side, the British Government has very recently authorized an increase in the use of grain to the extent of 33⅓ per cent by way of increasing the output of beer?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I saw that in a paper the other day. Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. In connection with the Willard bill of fare, it ought to be fair to say that in this country in fairly first-class hotels these prices do not prevail at all. For instance, at the Burlington you can get board, dinner and breakfast, for $35 per month; that is, 60 meals for $35, and those meals include just as good fare, although it may not be in such large quantities, as you get at the Willard.

Mr. MADDEN. I was comparing the Willard Hotel with the Savoy Hotel, because they are typical.

Mr. HARDY. The Willard Hotel, let me say to the gentleman, is made for high rollers who would not pay any less if they could. They hunt for a place where they can pay the most. I do not know that the sympathies of the country go out to the boarders at the Willard, or ought to. It is to these people that have to eat, people who have to feed at Childs's or somewhere else, who have to conserve their money, where the kale is the important thing and not the kale on the bill of fair. [Laughter.] For these people I think we ought to keep an eye out and see if we can not protect them.

Mr. MADDEN. The point I want to call the attention of the House to is a comparison between two typical hotels. You can not compare the charges of the Savoy with those at the Burlington, or the Savoy with another hotel similar to the Burlington, because they are not in the same class. When we make a comparison it must be a hotel with a like hotel.

Mr. HARDY. Then you will have to go to New York to compare a hotel with the Willard.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to do any injustice to the Willard Hotel. I simply used that as an illustration. But I do think the administration ought to get busy if it intends to regulate the food supply and curtail the cost of living. The administration came into power on the direct promise that it would reduce the cost of living to the American people, and yet it has been going skyward everywhere throughout the country from the day the Democrats came into power.

Now, there is an opportunity for them to show at the end of five years of active service at the head of the Government that they have the ability, if they have the desire, to do the thing which carried them into power. The American people will hail the day when the present administration proves its ability to reduce the cost of living without reducing the standard of living If they can do that and show why it is that we can afford to ship food products abroad and have them sold over there anywhere from 100 to 300 per cent less than they can be sold here, we will all hail the Democratic administration in charge of the Nation as the savior of the American people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RANDALL). Under the order previously made the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has 20 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to say something this morning about the cotton industry of the United States. I have given 12 years of close study to this great question, and I trust that I may be pardoned for saying that I know something about the cotton industry in all its forms and phases. The cotton crop of the United States last year was 5,000,000 bales short of the crop of 1914, and our cotton mills consumed last year 2,000,000 bales more than they did during the year 1914. In 1914 we consumed only one-third of the cotton crop produced in this country, and in 1916 our cotton mills consumed nearly two-thirds of the American crop. Cotton production in the United States has been on the decrease for two years, while cotton consumption has been tremendously on the increase. This year's crop will be the smallest in three years, and our cotton mills will consume a million more bales than they did last year. The world consumed more cotton last year than the world produced, and to-day the consumptive demand is much greater than the supply. The world demand for cotton within the next 12 months will be between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 bales greater than the world's crop this year.

Mr. Speaker, in order to produce food supplies for the allied armies cotton acreage has been reduced in India, Egypt, and Russia, and a very small crop at best will be produced this year in the Old World. In the United States the cotton farmers have greatly reduced their acreage for three reasons: First in order to produce as much as possible of their own food supplies; and, second, because of the President's appeal to them to produce food products; and the third and very necessary reason for cutting down the cotton acreage was the presence of the boll weevil in nearly three-fourths of the cotton-producing area. So we are bound to have a small cotton crop here. In order that you may understand how dangerous and destructive the boll weevil is I will tell you of his ravages in one county in my district. Prior to his much-deplored and unwelcome presence in Lowndes County the farmers there produced 43,000 bales of cotton in one year, but after the boll weevil opened up his campaign in all parts of the county cotton production fell off until the yield in one year was only 3,000 bales. Now, I want to show you gentlemen who think that the cotton producer is getting rich on 25-cent cotton that such is not the case. When the farmers of Lowndes County produced 43,000 bales and received 13 cents a pound and $65 a bale, they received in all $2,795,000, and when the crop was 3,000 bales and the price 25 cents a pound the farmers of that county received $375,000. So you see in spite of the price of 25 cents a pound the farmers of that county lacked $2,420,000 of receiving as much for their crop as they received when the price was 13 cents a pound. I want to say to you gentlemen who do not live in the cotton-growing States that two things are essential at all times to the growth and development of the cotton plant, and they are a sufficient amount of rain and warm weather. This year the repeated cold spells in May and June retarded the growth of the cotton plant and contributed much toward making a short crop an absolute certainty. Now, then, when you consider that we have reduced our cotton acreage and that weather conditions have been very unfavorable to cotton production, and in addition to this that the boll-weevil-infected area is greater than ever before, do you wonder that we who know the truth of the cotton situation are seeking to protect the cotton producer and the Government of the United States from the dangers that threaten them if cotton is to be kept in the provisions of the food-control bill?

Mr. Speaker, I was not surprised to see that the amendment to include cotton in the food-control bill had been introduced by a Senator representing a cotton-spinning State in New England, but I was greatly surprised by the position of some of those who voted for and aided in the adoption of that amendment. When we had the food-control bill under consideration in the House we were able to convince the House that it was improper and unwise to place cotton in its provisions.

And now, Mr. Speaker, in order that I may bring this grave question before the House at this time and discuss it I shall read a resolution which I have prepared upon the subject. I intend to introduce this resolution in the House to-morrow:

A resolution, by Mr. HEFLIN, to exempt cotton from the provisions of the food-control bill.

Whereas cotton is the most essential product to the successful conduct of the war; and

Whereas it is the duty of Congress to use every precaution possible to make sure of an adequate cotton supply for ourselves and our allies; and

Whereas the cost of cotton production has greatly increased on account of the high price of fertilizers and the ravages of the boll weevil; and

Whereas cotton production in India, Egypt, and Russia has been practically abandoned for the purpose of producing food supplies; and

Whereas the cotton producers of the United States have greatly reduced their acreage; and

Whereas the reduction of acreage, the cold weather, the rust, and the boll weevil have made a normal cotton crop in the United States this year impossible; and

Whereas the question that confronts the Congress and the country is not how cheaply cotton may be purchased, but whether we shall produce enough cotton for our domestic uses and war purposes; and

Whereas the failure to produce an adequate cotton supply for ourselves and our allies would be nothing short of a public calamity: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House that any legislation that makes cotton production unprofitable, and therefore an adequate yield uncertain and doubtful, is unwise and dangerous. Be it further

Resolved, That in view of the embarrassing and alarming conditions that now threaten the cotton crop of the United States that cotton should be taken out of the provisions of the food-control bill.

Mr. Speaker, the desire of Congress ought to be to do the wisest and best thing possible. The avowed purpose of the food-control bill is to stimulate and encourage production; but anyone acquainted with the peculiar situation of cotton knows that if cotton remains in the bill as ordered by the Senate that the effect will be to discourage and demoralize our cotton farmers, who are now making such a heroic fight to produce a crop in spite of the boll weevil. No other crop occupies such a delicate and dangerous position as does the cotton crop. It suffered in the spring, and its growth was greatly retarded by repeated cold spells. It has suffered in some sections on account of the rust and the cotton worm, and to-day in nearly three-fourths of the cotton belt the boll weevil is destroying crop prospects as never before. The area of the boll weevil is rapidly expanding, and the wisest and best thing that Congress can do is to encourage such prices for cotton as will enable the farmer to expend money and labor on a large scale in fighting the boll weevil, so that enough cotton, at least, will be produced to supply our mills and munition plants.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. MEEKER. Does the gentleman say that if the Government will take its hands off the prospect is that the profits in cotton will be better than to leave it in the bill?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will say to the gentleman that on the day the Senate adopted the amendment placing cotton in the bill the price broke $7 a bale. When you take into consideration the high price that the farmer has to pay for everything that he has to buy and then add to that the greatly increased cost of cotton production under boll-weevil conditions you can understand why it is that the farmer is not making much money on his cotton even when the price is 25 cents a pound. The farmer who used to produce upon the average 10 bales to the plow will not now produce more than 3 bales to the plow. Before the boll weevil came his 10 bales, at 15 cents a pound, brought $750, and now under boll-weevil conditions his 3 bales to the plow, at 25 cents a pound, will bring him only $375. So, without taking into consideration the greatly increased cost of production, he is losing $375 to the plow. If you beat down the price by legislation, you will not only make the production of cotton unprofitable, but you will make its production exceedingly doubtful, if not impossible. The farmer is already playing a losing game to the extent of $375 to the plow, and if you cut down the price he can not afford to carry on his costly warfare against the boll weevil and you will compel him to give up the fight in thousands of instances, and the result will be that the United States Government will not have cotton enough this fall to meet our domestic requirements, make uniforms for our soldiers, and supply our munition plants and those of our allies. [Applause.]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I represent a State that is both a cotton-producing State and a wheat-producing State. I have a telegram this morning from the wheat-producing section protesting against the exemption of cotton if wheat is kept in the bill. Can the gentleman explain why if it injures cotton it will not injure wheat?

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, cotton is neither food nor fuel, and it has no place in a food and fuel bill. Wheat is a food and properly belongs in a food-control bill. Consumers everywhere are urging that wheat be included in the bill, but nobody, so far as I know, except speculators and spinners, is urging that cotton be included in the provisions of the bill, and I will say, further, to the gentleman from Oklahoma that cotton occupies a position peculiar to itself. It is so essential to the successful conduct of the war that a failure of the cotton crop would be more dangerous to the cause of our allied armies than would the failure of any other crop. The imperative necessity for cotton for use in the war is greater than that of any other single product, and the situation with regard to an adequate cotton supply this year is different from that of any other crop.

If the wheat crop in the United States should fail in one or more localities, the chances are that the increased yield in other sections would more than make up for it, and if there should be a considerable decrease in the wheat crop of the United States, Russia could share with us the wheat crop now being produced over there. And again, if there should not be enough wheat, we could substitute corn, rice, and rye and barley and get along somehow. But the situation with regard to cotton is entirely different. In India, Egypt, and Russia cotton farming has been almost entirely abandoned and food crops are being cultivated where in times of peace cotton used to grow. And the cotton-using countries of the Old World are looking to us to produce cotton for ourselves and for them. But let us examine the facts and see what the exact situation here is. The President issued a call to the farmers of the South to plant less cotton and to strive on a larger scale than ever to produce food products.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman has said that upon the advice of the President the farmers reduced their acreage. Does not that point out the fatal danger of taking advice in the future from the Government on acreage of any crop?

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all, and I am not blaming the President, but I am asking Congress to be fair to the cotton farmer who was patriotic enough to follow the suggestion of the Commander of our Army and Navy. Then, following the President's suggestion, the farmers of the South greatly reduced their cotton acreage and planted more grain than ever before. Then the cotton that we did plant suffered greatly on account of the cold weather in the spring and early summer. And now over three-fourths of the cotton belt, the boll weevil is attacking the squares and little bolls and doing damage on a larger scale than at any prior time in the history of cotton production.

Mr. Speaker, the whole world is looking to the cotton belt of the United States for its cotton supply this year, and our success in the war against Germany depends absolutely upon cotton. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Speaker, if Congress, instead of encouraging and stimulating increased cotton production and making sure of an adequate supply of this all important product, shall, through its recklessness or shortsightedness, do the thing that will make cotton production unprofitable and cause cotton producers to abandon their fight against the boll weevil, such action will not only produce doubt and uncertainty as to an adequate cotton supply, but at a fearful cost to ourselves and our allies it will make certain a very small crop and an inadequate supply. So, gentlemen of the House, such a step, I care not how innocently taken, will be to the advantage of Germany and to the detriment and great injury of the United States. [Applause.] Some of you gentlemen do not understand the serious nature of the boll-weevil problem. You can not appreciate the injury and the damage that the boll weevil is doing to the cotton crop right now.

This is the fruiting time, and therefore the most critical time with the cotton plant where the boll weevil is carrying on his destructive work. Every little boll that he punctures will die; and if left alone just a little while, it will hatch out another boll weevil, and thus the work of destruction goes on. Now, in order to produce cotton at all under boll-weevil conditions, and in order to keep the boll-weevil family from increasing so dangerously fast at the fruiting time, the farmer has to cultivate the cotton more frequently than he did before the boll weevil came, and he must go in the morning and in the late afternoon every day at this season of the year and for two months to come and pick off and burn the little bolls. Now, then, what I want to impress upon you is that during this important fruiting time of the cotton plant, while the price of cotton is around 25 cents, the farmer will wage this costly and unceasing warfare against the boll weevil; but if you break the price by legislative action, as the Senate amendment did, and make it so that he can not produce cotton under the circumstances at a profit, he will be compelled to cease his warfare against the boll weevil; and if the action of Congress at this time cripples and disables the cotton farmer in the boll-weevil area so that he can not keep up his fight against that destructive pest, it will cut the yield to less than 8,000,000 bales, and upon Congress will rest the responsibility for our failure to produce cotton enough for our own mills and munition plants. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree with all that you have said about the poor prospects for a cotton crop, the ravages of the boll weevil, and the increased cost of production.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have described the cotton situation as it is.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. COX. If including cotton in the food-control bill will have a tendency to destroy the production of cotton, on the same principle how about the wheat growers of the North, who must wrestle year in and year out with the rust and the chinch bugs and everything else? Do not you think that if we fix a minimum price of $1.50 a bushel that you will destroy thousands and thousands of farmers in the North who have planted wheat this year?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not in favor of injuring a single wheat grower in the country.

Mr. COX. That is exactly what you will do.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, no. I am in favor of giving to the wheat grower a fair price and a reasonable profit, and the fact that wheat is grown in all sections of the country will be a powerful influence in securing for it a good price. But cotton is grown in only one section, and the people in the other three sections are not familiar with the elements of labor and cost that enter into its production, and therefore are not in a position to know what is a fair and reasonable price. We are producing cotton this year under more serious conditions and at a greater cost than ever before; but if you should ask the average man who is not acquainted with the cotton situation what a fair price for cotton would be, he would name a figure that would mean ruin to the cotton producers of the South.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. LITTLE. What would the gentleman say is a fair price for wheat?

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, I should say about one dollar and a half or maybe two dollars a bushel.

Mr. LITTLE. Where, at what place?

Mr. HEFLIN. Where the farmer can get it. Of course the cost of transportation is to be considered.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will be glad to yield to my friend from Missouri.

Mr. RUBEY. Is it not a fact that the cotton crop is already planted, and is it not a fact, also, that it is impossible for us to pass a law now that will affect the quantity or the quality of the cotton produced this year?

Mr. HEFLIN. It is a fact that the cotton crop is now under cultivation, but it is not a fact that adverse legislation will not affect the size of the crop this year.

Mr. RUBEY. But you can not affect the amount produced this year; you can affect the amount produced next year.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am fond of my good friend from Missouri and I regard him as one of the ablest and best friends that the farmer has in this House, but he is not acquainted with the conditions that now confront the cotton farmers of my section. Let me say to him and to other gentlemen who do not live in the cotton-growing States that if any legislation is now had that reduces the price of cotton the producer can not afford to expend money and labor as he is now doing to produce it. If the price of cotton is favorable the farmer will do all in his power to combat the boll weevil and produce what he can, but if the price is unprofitable and the farmer discontinues his fight on the boll weevil for one month at this time the size of the present crop will be greatly reduced.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it not a fact that in a greater portion of the cotton belt the cotton farmer buys his meat and flour and his corn?

Mr. HEFLIN. He buys a great deal of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. During this year has not he been required to pay more than twice as much for his corn and his meat and his flour than he ever had to pay before?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true, and he has paid this year as high as $17.50 a barrel for flour. He has paid very high prices for all that he has had to buy.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is so.

Mr. HEFLIN. Gentlemen from the West know that the cotton farmer buys some of his meat and wheat and corn from their constituents and he also buys their $200 and $250 mules with which to produce his cotton. Do you gentlemen desire to strike down cotton and destroy his purchasing power and not only injure us and the Government but yourselves also?

Mr. MEEKER. What would the gentleman consider would be a fair minimum of the guaranty for cotton?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know, but 25 cents is not too much when you consider the price the farmer has to pay for what he buys and the high cost of cotton production. Wool has sold for 60 cents a pound and some of it has brought more than that. Cotton at 30 cents a pound is not too high when wool is selling at 60 cents. I have heard of wool selling for 65 and 80 cents a pound.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman has stated that wool has sold for 65 and 80 cents. Where is that?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have seen the market price quoted in the newspaper at 60 cents, and a friend of mine in Kentucky told me that a gentleman in his State has sold some wool at 95 cents a pound.

Mr. QUIN. It sold at 64 cents a pound in my district last week.

Mr. HEFLIN. And still the cotton speculators and some of our New England spinners want legislation that will reduce the price of cotton.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to close this speech by reading or repeating to you what I said about the cotton situation when the food bill was up for consideration in the House. I said—the effort has been made here recently to mistreat and impose upon the southern farmer. Just a few days ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] tried to place a tax of $2.50 a bale on cotton. I opposed his amendment then and contributed as best I could to its defeat, and I want to say to him and to all others concerned that his amendment should never have been offered. It was inexcusable and indefensible, for cotton has to do with nearly every phase of the life of the individual and the life of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, cotton is the most serviceable product in the kingdom of agriculture. No other one product contains the three essential necessities of life—food, clothing, and shelter. [Applause.] It is the most useful product in time of peace, and on account of its vast and various properties, it is indispensable in time of war. It is now playing the most important part in the greatest war that the world has ever known. [Applause.] Cotton has treasured in its fiber the heat of the sun, and imprisoned in its snowy locks the secret of the lightning's power. When touched with nitric acid it hurls implements of destruction more powerful than the thunderbolts of Jove. [Applause.] Our gunpowder and explosive shells derive their tremendous power from cotton. In this boll of cotton is the substance to which our soldiers must look for their uniforms and shelter. Cotton furnishes wings for the aeroplanes and sails for our ships at sea. [Applause.] It flies in the flag above the soldier. It goes with him in his uniform and it spreads its white wings above him when he sleeps on the tented field. [Applause.] Cotton is the power behind the bullet, and it is the healing balm in the bandages of the Red Cross and Hospital Corps. It soothes and comforts the wounded soldier and wraps its mantle about him in his long last sleep. [Applause.] The oil of the cotton seed is a wholesome food and contains a substitute for glycerin, large quantities of which are used in the manufacture of powerful explosives. The seed contains food for man and beast, and it has in it choice elements of plant food, which when applied to the soil makes the earth to blossom as a rose. [Applause.] Cotton is the poor man's friend. It clothes the naked and its seed feeds the hungry. It blesses and serves the people in many ways. The Government as never before is dependent upon cotton. It is a national necessity and an international factor in the struggle now going on in Europe. In this world struggle in which we have been compelled to fight to preserve our own rights and liberties, cotton is to perform the most signal service [applause], and any man who would burden it with a tax and handicap and injure those who produce it, in his shortsightedness and recklessness, is weakening the arm of this Government in the prosecution of a war in which our very existence as a free country is at stake. [Applause.] The rust, the cotton worm, and the boll weevil are doing enough to decrease the cotton production and to cause the cotton producer to turn to other crops and to abandon his efforts to produce cotton on a large scale. Gentlemen, the cotton producer needs your help and your encouragement, and not your persecution in the form of unjust taxation. [Applause.] He is producing cotton now under great difficulty and at tremendous cost. Do not add to the burden that he is already carrying. During the trials through which he is passing in his efforts to produce cotton, a product so necessary to the successful conduct of this war, if you can not give him your sympathy and good will, be just and patriotic enough to let him alone. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, if it will not jeopardize the five minutes I want to take, I yield my period to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who would prefer coming in at this time, and I shall follow him, if that is all right.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask unanimous consent that after these two gentlemen get through I have five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] asks unanimous consent for five minutes after the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has had his five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. Reserving the right to object, which I do not intend to do, I would ask unanimous consent that I have 10 minutes following the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Now, the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] is for 10 minutes, following the gentleman from Oklahoma. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I have not squirted any stuff around here for a long time, and I would like to have 10 minutes after the gentleman from Indiana is through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to many eloquent speeches by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and I have admired every one of them from an elocutionary standpoint. There is always a love and devotion for old "King Cotton" in what the gentleman from Alabama has to say. All others in this House of Representatives might be eliminated, and yet, with the gentleman from Alabama here, cotton would still be "king" in the estimation of the good people whom he represents.

The gentleman is forceful, but in some respects his mind runs single track on this question of cotton. He is so earnest that sometimes he errs in thinking that others, who have an equal interest with him in the development of this country and its products, desire to hurt cotton, or in the speeches they make here, asking for "equal rights for all and special privileges to none," may be inveighing against this special product.

The gentleman from Alabama has just said something similar to what a distinguished Senator from Illinois said in a recent political campaign in New Hampshire about those "who oppose the President being for the Kaiser," except that he paraphrases it so that now it appears that "he who is against 'King Cotton' is for the Kaiser."

Well, let us see where the charge of the gentleman from Alabama leads us. I quote from one of the newspapers of this morning, a paper which seems to be very close to the cotton situation as it comes from the Council of National Defense. If what it says may be taken as coming from some one close to the administration—and I have sometimes suspected that the gentleman from Alabama has advised the administration upon the subject of cotton—it has a suggestion, at least, of the influence of his autocracy the Kaiser of Germany. The article is from the Public Ledger and deals with cotton exports. It says:

The most alarming situation is shown by the figures which the Government has in its possession for the crop year 1914–15, when the European neutrals took over from the United States no less than 1,998,000 bales, an amount that finds no precedent in the export history of America. Holland got about 35,000 bales the year preceding the war, 520,000 bales in the first year of the war, and about 100,000 bales in the second year of the war, when England, realizing the seriousness of the situation, shut down on the imports.

Now, the beginning of this article reads thus——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman wait until I read this first?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not catch the statement about the volume of the exportations of cotton that you say have never been paralleled in the history of the trade.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am reading from a newspaper about cotton exports to neutral countries. It says:

In 1914–15, when the European neutrals took over from the United States no less than 1,998,000 bales, an amount that has no precedent in the export history of America.

This is linking up some of those gentlemen who inveigh against speeches criticizing the administration on the floor of the House of Representatives, with his autocracy the Kaiser, who is the special friend just now apparently, of somebody in the cotton business, for this article continues:

Cotton, used in the manufacture of explosives, probably will be placed under the export license ban by the ruling of the next presidential proclamation. Startling figures have been submitted to the members of the council and its advisory board to show that Germany has absorbed tremendous quantities through neutral countries. For instance it has been shown that in the year 1914 Sweden alone sent into Germany approximately 9,800,000 pounds of cotton.

Can it be that my distinguished and eloquent friend from Alabama has been advising the White House recently with respect to the proclamations involving other things than cotton? I ask that question because it is significant that the President in his proclamation, which was inserted in the RECORD on July 9, expressly eliminated cotton from those things that were to be subject to embargo. By leaving it out of the proclamation he gave cotton a right which was not accorded to any food product or to any other material mentioned in the proclamation—the right to proceed abroad; and if this report be true to proceed to neutral countries and thence on to Germany. I challenge the gentleman from Alabama to look at the proclamation of the President, in which those things that are subject to embargo are seen to include not only food products, but coal, coke, fuels, steel billets, pig iron, steel plates, structural plates, scrap, and a variety of other materials entering not into the food supply, but into the manufacture of munitions. The gentleman from Alabama knows, and has indicated several times, that cotton enters largely into the manufacture of munitions of war, and whether due to his influence with the President or not it now appears that the proclamation from the White House includes all these products of the United States except cotton, which is left free to go abroad if it so desires.

The gentleman from Alabama admits that cotton enters into the manufacture of ammunition, and the reports from the newspapers this morning indicate that it has been going to Germany in large quantities, through the neutral countries that have been obtaining it from the United States. And bear in mind that cotton is exclusive to certain States of the United States, from one of which the eloquent gentleman from Alabama comes. If it is a question of helping the Kaiser——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to say to the gentleman that the whole people of the United States are dependent on us for cotton, and the allied forces are dependent upon us for their cotton supply, and if the yield this year is small the situation will be embarrassing to us and to them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the people are more dependent on wheat, I will say to the gentleman, than they are on cotton, because people must have food although sometimes they dispense with clothing; but, in any event, they must have food.

Mr. MADDEN. They would not be able to shoot the cotton if they did not have the food.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. They could wear last year's clothes, as most of us do, but they can not eat last year's meals. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly; and the people in certain sections could get along well enough with a smaller amount of clothing on account of the climatic conditions than could the people of certain more rigorous sections. There is a difference in the matter of clothing. The gentleman from Alabama can wear white clothing and look beautiful in it, but the gentleman from Massachusetts must wear heavier attire, even if he sweats under the burden of it here in the Nation's Capitol. [Laughter.]

The census reports inform us just where we are on the cotton question, and they indicate no such condition in regard to the ravages of the boll weevil as has been pictured by the eloquent gentleman from Alabama. I was surprised at his bringing in the boll weevil just now. It was unexpected. In these times of great prosperity in the South, when the banks are overflowing with gold, not only from this country, but also from foreign countries, a prosperity in which I glory, I almost wept when I heard the gentleman from Alabama dilate upon the devastations of the boll weevil. I thought we had covered all that in the Agricultural bill, and had almost forgotten it. I did not expect that in these times of high finance we would have the boll weevil buzzing around and troubling our peace of mind. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. The price of cotton in 1914 fell to 6 cents, and the farmers of the South—and I am speaking of the farmers that produced it—have never recovered from the losses they sustained that year. And now the boll weevil is reducing the yield of cotton, so that the crop will not amount to much more than 9,000,000 bales.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; and I can say to the gentleman that I voted for all the appropriations to exterminate the boll weevil, and I am willing to continue to so vote until that pest is driven out. But if the gentleman's constituents have not recovered from their losses of 1914, my constituents, who manufacture cotton, have not recovered from their losses of 1913 and 1914. We suffered also.

Mr. HEFLIN. And in return for the gentleman's good offices in favor of cotton I want to assure the gentleman that I am not in favor of hamstringing the steel industry. I am in favor of fair dealing with the steel industry and in favor of everybody having a reasonable profit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, no doubt the gentleman has noticed with some satisfaction that the steel industry has reported to the White House this morning and indicated that it will be good, and that hereafter it will live in a manner that will be satisfactory to the President and, I hope, to the gentleman from Alabama.

Now, in the census report of June, 1917, we find that the cotton crop of 1916 was a little short of that for 1914. It amounted to 11,449,530 bales.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman please repeat those figures?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It amounted to 11,449,000 bales, equivalent to 500 pounds to the bale. The gentleman from Alabama has those figures at his tongue's end. It is true with respect to the production of cotton, the State of Alabama fell off a little in 1916, and I regret it as much as the gentleman from Alabama does. Whether it was due to a desire to rotate the crops or to a fear that cotton could not be sold abroad I do not know——

Mr. MEEKER. It was due to following the advice of the President to cut down the acreage.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If Alabama followed the advice of the President and cut down the crop production, it may have been due to the advice given to the President by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FOCHT. Then why not lay the blame on the President instead of Congress?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RANDALL). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Alabama had 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Mississippi is to have 10 minutes. I ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I want the gentleman to go right square into this question that I have just now raised. Following the advice of the Government the cotton planters reduced their acreage. Not even the President could foresee the cold weather or the boll weevil, and here we have a short acreage, and a crop that has been destroyed by the ravages of its natural enemies. How much more does the President know about the wheat crop than he did about the cotton crop?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not going to criticize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and I am not going to criticize the President. I am doing the best I can to stand by the President, except——

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman does not get the point. I want him to discuss the wisdom of the policy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My time is running and I do not want to be interrupted, although there is point to the gentleman's questions. I am endeavoring to say that I am trying to stand by the President, except that I think the President should have included cotton as well as other articles in his embargo. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] differs with me about that, and wants cotton to have exemption. I have some evidence here indicating that there must have been a reason for leaving cotton out of that embargo proclamation. Apparently cotton was to continue to have the special privilege that it has always enjoyed, and which is not enjoyed by any other product of the United States, so far as I know; it was to continue to go abroad. It may be primary information to the gentleman and to others that about two-thirds of the cotton crop goes abroad in normal times. There has always been a good market for raw cotton in Germany and in England and in France, because over there, with their many mills and their cheap labor they were able to manufacture cotton and after paying the planter of the United States a good price for the raw material still send their manufactured products back into the United States and beat out the American manufacturer in competition.

Mr. HEFLIN. Before the war we sold to Germany and Austria about 3,000,000 bales, and Germany, Austria, and Turkey have obtained some cotton through neutral countries since the war broke out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And used it for war purposes?

Mr. HEFLIN. And of course Germany used it for war purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Which is pretty close to treason, according to the gentleman's own statement.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not say that the men who sold it were friends of the Kaiser. I said that Members of Congress who made cotton production unprofitable, and as a result there would not be an adequate supply for this Government in time of war, they were, it may be ignorantly or innocently, aiding the German Government and injuring their own Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Those who send cotton to Germany, whether directly or through neutrals, are giving aid to the enemy, and that is the point the gentleman was making against certain other individuals who occasionally speak in a manner that does not comport with the gentleman's ideas of administrative propriety.

Mr. HEFLIN. The cotton that went to Germany through the neutral countries was sold by some American exporter to some one in a neutral country, and then it went from the neutral country into Germany, and we did not find that out until recently.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the cotton got there just the same, and cotton being an exclusive product, that which got there was going to the aid of the enemy, and its going abroad is being specially abetted now if the proclamation embodying other war munitions leaves cotton out of the embargo.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; cotton was such an essential element in the successful conduct of the war that men would run great risks to get it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly, but I assume we need all the cotton we can get in the United States for war purposes for the manufacture of duck for tents and clothing and for various other purposes. We need it badly now, because our men are suffering for clothing and for tents and for sufficient accommodations to properly house them; and if there was more cotton in the United States and less going abroad the United States Government would be able to get it cheaper, and we would be able to manufacture more of it and to put more men at work at a higher rate of pay developing the industry in the United States. I would rather have it here than abroad.

Mr. HEFLIN. But the cotton supply is practically exhausted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but the gentleman knows that under normal trade conditions, which practically hold in war time, at least 60 per cent of all the cotton produced in the United States goes abroad.

Mr. HEFLIN. That has not been true——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That raises the price of cotton to the American consumer. It raises the price of cotton to the wearer of American-made cotton goods.

Mr. HEFLIN. That has not been true for three years. We did not export much more than one-fourth of the crop last year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman deny that we are furnishing the allies with cotton now?

Mr. HEFLIN. We have been furnishing them with cotton——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman deny that we have been furnishing them with cotton at any period of the war?

Mr. HEFLIN. We have been furnishing it to them, and before our declaration of war we would have furnished it to Germany if Germany could have carried the cotton there. At the beginning of the war Germany obtained cotton from the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course we were furnishing it to them in large quantities, and it was coming back in the form of manufactured goods, to compete with the products of American mills.

Mr. HEFLIN. We showed no partiality about shipping to Germany or the allied countries, and until we got into the war it was not our fault that Germany was not getting cotton from us.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to repeat what the gentleman said about cotton as a munition of war, but I want to read into the RECORD a paragraph from the report of the Director of the Census with respect to cotton. The cotton man is just about as shrewd when it comes to making a profit in these war times as any other man. The President's proclamation about "blood and profits" may apply to some manufacturers in this country, but it also applies to some producers in this country. I will not lay it up to the cotton planter any more than to the raiser of grain or the producers of any other product. They are all making money and they are all going to make money unless the President and this Congress devise some means of holding them in check.

Up to the present time, however, neither the President nor Congress have produced the check, because prices to the consumer have risen in things made out of raw cotton, just as they continue to rise in respect to the food products that enter into the home of the poor man. Hear what your Director of the Census says:

> Despite the marked falling off in the crops of the last two years as compared with that of 1914, the output of linters continues to show a pronounced increase. The figures now available cover only the nine months ending April 30, 1917, during which period 1,210,876 equivalent 500-pound bales of linters were produced, as against 931,141 bales from the crop of 1915 and 856,900 bales from the crop of 1914. The high prices obtained in recent years for this fiber, which is used extensively in the manufacture of guncotton and smokeless powder, have so stimulated the production of linters that the yield per ton of seed treated is now considerably more than double that of a few years ago.

Are you then checking the growth and production of cotton that enters into the manufacture of commodities and devoting your attention principally to that which goes into the manufacture of munitions? As so large a portion of your linters is shipped into Germany, I ask you who is helping the Kaiser?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman allow me to tell him what a linter is?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My time is very limited; I can not yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I hate for the gentleman to expose his ignorance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I probably did not make it clear to the gentleman from South Carolina. I was making the point that a kind of cotton——

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is not a kind of cotton; it is a by-product of cotton.

Mr. RAGSDALE. It is not a kind of cotton.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, a by-product of cotton which enters into the manufacture of munitions has been more encouraged for profit than the general production. This has its effect on the people at large in the cities and on the consumers of the land. I want to help cotton, but I want cotton to be fair. I am ready and willing, all other products being fairly treated, to keep cotton "king" in its own country. I have no objection—I wish it well—but when cotton is exempted from taxation, when cotton comes in and gets an appropriation for everything from the planting of the seed to the harvesting of the crop—and that is all paid for out of the common fund of the people of the United States—when cotton is given a special census, and when cotton insists that it shall be free from all taxes, and that it shall then penetrate into the enemy country, to the aid of the enemy, I think we have a right to ask whether cotton shall wear wings all the time, and then lay the blame for high prices on the manufactures, the grain, or the other products of the people.

I have two letters, one from a manufacturer of my own city. He is a manufacturer of duck for the Government of the United States, and says that the Government is paying extraordinary prices for the cotton it uses in the manufacture of these war munitions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Now, I hope the gentleman, out of that five minutes, will allow me to explain what linters are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman to do that later. I will make it perfectly clear in the RECORD what linters are. I will furthermore place the gentleman from South Carolina alongside of the gentleman from Alabama as a champion of King Cotton if he so desires.

Mr. RAGSDALE. My friend is very kind, as he always is——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not help that, because the gentleman is always so kind to me.

Mr. RAGSDALE. What I would like to do is to keep the RECORD straight in regard to what linters are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will endeavor to see that the RECORD is kept straight. I do not care to have my speech circulated in South Carolina, I will say to the gentleman, although I think it might do some good.

Mr. RAGSDALE. If the gentleman will permit me, I certainly think he ought to circulate it in South Carolina if it will do any good there, because I do not think it will do any good elsewhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it will do some good at home. I have heard many speeches wholly for home consumption in this House. Now, I would like the people up in my country, who are paying the bulk of the enormous burden of taxation, to know how that bill is made up against them. I would like to have them know something about the pretense that they are to have a cheaper cost of living when it continues to soar so high that they can scarcely obtain the necessaries of life. I would like to have my people understand a little bit of the wiles, if you please, of those who have the power to deliver commodities to them at a reasonable price, but who always manage, even in a patriotic spirit, to make a goodly profit for their own pockets. Let the cotton planter make money. I want him to make money and prosper. I am delighted that he has more money in the bank now than he ever had before. I am delighted that the South is prospering; I want to see it grow strong and develop; but I do not want any undue advantage given to one section of the country over any other. And since my friends in the cotton States frequently inveigh against the cotton manufacturers up my way, let me read this from one of the latter. It gives the other fellow's point of view:

The various industries with which I am connected use enormous quantities of raw cotton, and we are working with every facility we have with the interest of the Government before us. * * * We are working all together on as low a margin of profit as possible and feel it is the duty of every man in the country to do likewise.

Unfortunately the cotton grower and those who handle in a speculative way the raw material do not seem to feel this way, and they are continually advancing the price of raw cotton to such an extent that the manufacturers are compelled to advance their prices to the Government accordingly.

This man is manufacturing for the Government. He adds:

This is costing the Government a loss of many millions of dollars. It is very evident that cotton is on a fictitious basis, for the fact that even the mention of a Government control of the price of cotton caused it to drop a few days ago, practically $10 a bale.

If that is true, and the gentleman from Alabama says there has been a drop in price because of the mere suggestion that cotton was to be embargoed, as other food and war supplies were to be embargoed in the President's proclamation——

Mr. HEFLIN. It had already been put into the Senate bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If this is true, then there must be a fictitious value in cotton, and somebody between the producer and the consumer must be making the money, and perhaps it is a fair thing to call it to the attention of the President of the United States and his food dictator, even if we have to extend to the food dictator the power to fix the price of cotton. There would then at least be less speculation and we would know where we were coming out on these raw materials that we have to buy.

Another gentleman, who is a manufacturer, writes me and incloses in his letter a proposal from a dealer in cotton yarn. That dealer, offering yarn, says:

We understand the price on this yarn to-day is around 44 cents for Government use. We believe we could sell our little lot, providing unsold, when we hear from you at 40 cents, delivery to start August 15 to September 15.

This man had about 100,000 pounds, and he proposes to sell cotton at 40 cents when the Government seems to be buying it somewhere around 44 cents. My correspondent, to whom this offer was made, says:

I inclose you a letter received July 9, to indicate to you to what extent the cotton spinners of the South are swindling the manufacturing interests of the North in the price of cotton yarn.

The cotton producer need not get worried, though, over that statement. I am only quoting the word "swindling." But the manufacturer, who feels that way about it, continues:

This is the grade that we are using in the manufacture of rugs; and as late as February, 1916, we were paying 13¾ cents per pound for this material. The boosting of price has gone on since that time. You can readily see what great sacrifice the South is making to win the war.

I do not want to subscribe to that bit of sarcasm, but I continue to read:

The great cost of the raw materials has halted our business because of the high price of goods and we are not running our mill half time.

This comes from a manufacturer who is not making war munitions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall not ask for any more time, but I submit, in conclusion, that the President of the United States should take the cotton situation into account in any further embargo proclamation he may issue. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, within the last 10 days I have received a great many communications in reference to what ought to be done to relieve the situation pertaining to the sale of wheat. That question is asked because of the pendency of the food-control bill, which has in it an item which indicates that the minimum price for wheat will be fixed by the Government. I stated in the discussion of the food-control bill that in my judgment the minimum price would become the maximum price, and I have no reason to revise my opinion in respect to that. While there was a general demand for a minimum price, if it becomes the maximum, I think it will be a very unwise provision in the bill, notwithstanding the fact that people insisted upon having it there. The wheat situation to-day is alarming from the viewpoint of the farmer.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Would not that suggestion hold with reference to the minimum price being the maximum price as applied to all articles?

Mr. FESS. I am rather inclined to think it would. If the Government controls prices, no man is going to buy for the purpose of resale at a price that is hazardous. I presume that the situation in my State is not different from what it is in other States. We have grown into the custom there of not putting the wheat in the granary, as we used to do when I was a boy, but of thrashing it in the field and sending it directly to the elevator, not to be stored but to be sold. The custom of building granaries in my section of the country has ceased, consequently the farmer can not safely thrash his wheat to be stored in his own storehouse, and never in our country was the capacity of the warehouses in our towns and cities sufficient to house all of the wheat grown in the country. It was taken by the grain dealer of every community and resold. Here is our situation at present. I get letter after letter asking what to do. The grain dealers will not purchase the wheat. They can not safely fix a price to pay the farmer for they know not what it can be resold for. They say there is a provision in a bill that is pending before Congress, upon which Congress has not yet acted, and upon which the Senate will not act soon, which carries the authority in the President to fix the price of wheat, and they do not know what to pay for it; they are afraid if they purchase it there will be a price fixed that will cause them loss of money, they will therefore not take the risk. The farmer faces this situation. He has not been in the habit of stacking his wheat or ricking it, as we used to do when I was a boy, when we had to wait for the machine to come around to thrash it, and was compelled to rick it to avoid the danger of rotting in the shock. To-day they just ask the machine to come into the field with a few hands instead of the whole neighborhood as of yore. In these modern times they do not have to have anything like the number of people engaged with the use of this modern labor-saving machinery. For years the great bulk of the wheat grown in Ohio is either taken to the barn in the sheaf or thrashed out in the field and hauled direct to the grain elevator to be marketed at the ruling price.

Under the situation produced by the food-control legislation as proposed, the farmers who have no barn room, although they are not in the habit of ricking it, if they do not rick it they run the risk of wet weather setting in and losing the whole crop, unless they thrash it, and, as I said a moment ago, they will not thrash it, because many have no place to put it. This delay has created a situation with us of more or less of a panic. I think my section of the State is one as up to date as any State in the Union. It is not the people who are in hard luck. I represent a great number of very well-to-do farmers, intelligent people, and they put the question up to me in that way. What can be done? Of course, the delay is hurtful. Also I fear there has been too much gratuitous talk on what Mr. Hoover is going to do. But I rise for this purpose: There is a misconception in the country. Here is a letter that states:

> Judging from the newspaper reports from day to day, the delay has been brought about by the prohibitionists trying to force Congress to enact prohibition legislation before the other two important measures are acted upon.

Meaning the revenue bill and this food-control bill, and the writer is drastic in his observation on what he says is the unwisdom of unguarded and unwise enthusiasm for a measure that, even were he wholly in sympathy with it, which he is not, he thinks at this stage it ought not to be done in this way. This man has made up his mind from the information that he has gleaned from the press dispatches which are sent out from Washington that are printed in the metropolitan newspapers, most of which are quite willing that the public believe that this delay is due to the friends of conservation of our grains. I want to call to attention that the delay of this legislation can not be laid to the door of the House of Representatives. [Applause.] We received the bill on the 18th of June, devoted five days to a discussion of it, and passed it at the close of the fifth day, and we did not reach the prohibition clause until 2 o'clock in the afternoon on the fifth day, and there was no delay on the part of this House [applause] in the discussion of that bill, and most certainly not by the friends of temperance legislation.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield.

Mr. COX. When the bill came to the House and the House passed it, is it not true that it contained a prohibition section?

Mr. FESS. I was going to say that. This letter also says that we were proceeding with legislation on the wrong basis, and there was inclosed a resolution adopted in Toledo by a State association of grain dealers saying that they oppose rider legislation, which, while it did not specifically mention this particular measure, I judge from the context of the letter and the resolution it did refer to this legislation. It is a pertinent question to ask how the country was led to believe this was rider legislation. The thirteenth section of that bill included the possibility of prohibition by proclamation of the President, and we simply changed it by striking out all that was in the section pertaining to the President's authority to decree prohibition and by act of Congress enacted prohibition directly. In other words, we reached the result sought by law of Congress rather than by proclamation of the President. [Applause.] That was not any rider, but regular parliamentary procedure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes more if he so desires.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it not true that the prohibition section which was adopted by the House Saturday afternoon as stated by the gentleman was so extreme, so extraordinary, that if it were contained in the original bill this House would have had time to give it intelligent consideration, discussion, and deliberation so that it would not be in the Senate now held up as it is? Is it not true that the fact that it was so hurriedly put in at the last moment is the cause of all the delay?

Mr. FESS. The hurried action of putting the amendment on the bill was the vote of the House. The previous question was not ordered, there was unlimited time to discuss it. In order to avoid the charge that my friend's interests are making, to wit, that we are delaying the legislation, we did not delay it but asked for a vote, and now objection must not be made to the temperance people of this House avoiding the charge of delay by saying we rushed it through without consideration. And exactly the same thing is true in the Senate. It is not the temperance forces in that body who are delaying this legislation. [Applause.] If on the one hand the temperance people would delay legislation in the interest of consideration these interests are objecting to them for their delay; and on the other hand if they proceeded with expedition not to delay it the same interests then object to the temperance people for not giving sufficient consideration. Why we can not please those interests. The thing to do was what we did, to take the bill as it came to us and then proceed in regular order, not in the form of a rider, not inject something that is out of order, but to proceed to perfect the legislation as was done in this House. We went by way of amendment one step beyond, namely, we did by law what you were willing to do only as a last resort, to give the President, by proclamation, the power to do. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But did not the gentleman go too far——

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And when this bill left the House was it not the hope of the temperance people that it would be modified in a sensible degree by the Senate?

Mr. FESS. Oh, what would be sensible to the gentleman's mind might not be sensible to another gentleman's mind.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; the gentleman might not trust his own mind on a matter that was out of order, and considering the impossibility of carrying through——

Mr. FESS. Anything in the way of legislation that does not suit certain interests is irregular and out of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. True; and the section that passed the House suits the interests of the patent-medicine fakirs, the moonshiners, and the drug sellers.

Mr. FESS. That is the same old argument. If you do not like the patent-medicine fakirs because of any illicit practices, put them out of business [applause], or compel them to cease the hurtful practice if it exists. That sort of argument does not get anywhere.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If A has property which is recognized as property on which he has paid taxes and been authorized to own and do business in connection with, and B proposes legislation which destroys that property without compensation, is it unreasonable to expect that A would oppose such legislation or would be pleased by it?

Mr. FESS. If A was found on a ship on which there was discovered a noxious or dangerous epidemic, he would be put in quarantine and his interest would not be considered when to consider it would be a total forfeiture of the public interest. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman evades the question.

Mr. FESS. I may. I do not mean to evade it. But I will answer my friend in this way: If you mean I have no right to say whether you shall do this or shall not do it, and I with others——

Mr. SLAYDEN. That was not my question, and the gentleman, I think, knows it was not.

Mr. FESS. I thought it was.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No. I say, do you think any man who owns property, recognized as property, and fights you with a determination to oppose the power to destroy that property without compensation, has not the right to resent it?

Mr. FESS. Probably he would. We found this same situation during the Civil War.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it honest to take his property without compensation?

Mr. FESS. It was honest to take and destroy human slavery during the Civil War, because the destruction of that property was necessary to perpetuate our type of government as we understood it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman seeks to meet the issue with the discussion of a sectional question, where his prejudices and the prejudices of the people to whom men of his type appeal would put me to a disadvantage. I do not care to do that. I simply say that if the gentleman wants to take property away from others without compensation, he may do it, but I do not want to do so.

Mr. FESS. I do not consider any such innuendo——

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not speak in innuendo.

Mr. FESS. I want the gentleman to understand for all time that the liquor business is indicted and it is going out of business. [Applause.] And if it will proceed in regular order, I am one of the first men in this House to vote to recompense the people for the property destroyed; but if they do not, and will not be willing to meet that condition, it will be destroyed without recompense. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have not the slightest doubt that the gentleman wants to do it.

Mr. FESS. That is exactly what will be done, and your people will indorse it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They do not indorse taking people's property without compensation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, only yesterday the mails brought to the desks of Members of the House, and I doubt not to the Members of the body at the other end of the Capitol, marked editorials from the Courier-Journal and the Cincinnati Enquirer, bitterly attacking those Members who in this food crisis have insisted that no grain shall be used during the period of the war for the manufacture of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes.

Watterson's editorial carries the caption "The Kaiser scores," and proceeds to assert that the Senate action on the conservation of grains against alcoholic waste would cost at least $5,000,000,000, to say nothing of the loss of employment by closing down the distilleries. He continues:

> The losses in property, the losses in revenues, the increase in taxation, would amount fully to $5,000,000,000, and this would not include the loss of employment to the army of people who would be thrown out of work. Five billion dollars! If the Kaiser could collect that tribute of us he would, indeed, be the world autocrat he dreamed of being when he set out for France in the summer of 1914.

The imagination is never so unlimited in its range as when dealing in profits. It is this element that stalks on the gambling exchanges that enables the pauper to see himself a millionaire after a spasm of business on the curb.

The liquor element in Congress did not keep step with the editors. Their figures varied from $600,000,000 to $2,000,000,000, necessary to carry into effect the provisions. What are the real facts?

The Senate amendment provides that the Government shall take over the liquor now in bond at cost and not more than 10 per cent profit.

The cost to the Government of this legislation reached through the imagination of the men in Congress speaking for liquor is a billion dollars, but reached by actual figures is strangely less as produced by M. Marcel, manager of the anti-trust distilleries of Kansas City, Mo.

Cost of production of a gallon of whisky.

	Cost of 50-gallon barrel.	Cost of single gallon.
9 bushels of No. 2 or No. 3 corn, at 50 cents	$4.50
1 bushel rye and barley malt	1.00
Yeast for fermenting	.10
Cost of distillation	.40
Cost of producing	6.00	$0.12
Cooperage for barrel of 50 gallons	2.75	.05½
Freight and hauling from district to original warehouse	1.50	.03
Total cost in warehouse per gallon		.20½

The Cincinnati Enquirer carried recently an advertisement for sale of whisky at $1.40 per gallon. I have not consulted the price current to ascertain quotations to-day.

One of the best sources of information on the cost of whisky is the record of the State of South Carolina when the State went into the dispensary business. Our colleague, the Hon. W. F. STEVENSON, sat in these cases and has the best possible opportunity to secure accurate information on this matter. He has furnished me with the data on the cost of manufacturing distilled liquors, which is a matter of official record, and the figures should silence all alarms stimulated by these distress calls of the liquor propaganda that the Government is going into bankruptcy by the elimination of the whisky traffic for the period of the war. The judge's figures, which I trust he will put in the RECORD, support the contention of those of us who assert that the Senate amendment will not entail an expenditure of money greatly beyond $100,000,000 instead of the $5,000,000,000 contended by the liquor editors and statesmen of the country in the name of temperance (?).

In fact, on the basis of the official statements of those referred to, the cost to the Government would be only about $50,000,000 for the liquor now in bond. The legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League declared on this point:

> Its value to the Government will be as much or more than this when we consider that by the time the Government would purchase these distilled spirits for munition purposes the liquor dealers will demand the advanced prices of the material, labor, and revenue which will be in effect at that time. From the standpoint, therefore, of economy, this purchase is a wise one. The actual cost of the liquor now in bond is not a matter of guesswork. The Internal Revenue Department has access to every book of the distillers and can determine accurately the cost of each season's crop during the eight years covered by the whisky now in bond.
> LIQUOR REVENUE A BURDEN TO THE GOVERNMENT.
> Every dollar the Government gets in revenue from the liquor traffic is paid not by the liquor dealer but ultimately by the consumer. It costs the Government many dollars in return to care for the wreckage which liquor causes. The liquor dealer never has and never will ultimately pay this tax. By advancing a few million dollars he gets the privilege to rob the people of two and a half billion dollars every year.
> The liquor dealers complained when the Senate passed the Cummins amendment preventing the withdrawal of whisky for beverage purposes. Banks holding whisky securities wired the Senate that they would be ruined. Now, when the Government offers to purchase the whisky this same crowd yells disaster! The reason for their present cry is that the proposed plan prevents the liquor dealer from selling the whisky at retail at about $6 per gallon profit instead of a possible 10 per cent profit as proposed in the Senate amendment.
> SENATE AMENDMENT A BENEFIT TO THE GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE.
> It takes a barrel of distilled spirits to produce the powder or explosive to fire one of the great guns in this war. When the water is taken out of the alcohol there will only be something like a hundred million gallons. If it takes a barrel to fire one gun this would only leave enough alcohol to fire 2,000,000 shots. All the alcohol in America, it is calculated, would not make the powder or the explosives for the cannonading for three days in a battle like that of Verdun. The Government can use this liquor to make liquor to kill the enemy instead of killing its own subjects and allowing these selfish interests to make abnormal profits out of it.
> This Government never can grow strong by encouraging a traffic and getting revenue from a business which weakens and destroys the two essentials to victory—"food supply and man power." When the liquor business has been entirely prohibited and the last distillery and brewery closed we will then realize the wisdom of Justice Grier's decision years ago, when he answered this whole revenue bugaboo from the Supreme Court bench in these words: "If there should be a loss of revenue from use of this power, she (meaning the Government) would be the gainer a thousandfold in the health, wealth, and happiness of her people."

This is the league against which the Cincinnati Enquirer editorially declared it "the limit," which was marked and sent to Members of Congress yesterday.

Their conduct which called out the following language:

> For brazen effrontery, unmitigated gall, superlative egoism, transcendent audacity, supreme impudence, commend us to the legislative committee of the prohibition lobby that has throttled war legislation and has delayed the Nation's preparation for the great conflict in which it is engaged—in the issue of July 10 was their favorable response to the request to meet a Senator on the matter of eliminating from the food bill the items of beer and wine which had been placed in the bill by the House. This is the statement which offends the Enquirer:

> On last Thursday, June 28, the legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America, which was in session with the national executive committee of the league in Washington, was summoned to the office of United States Senator MARTIN, of Virginia, the Democratic floor leader of the Senate. On arrival at his office we were informed that the President had just sent a message to him to ascertain, in view of a prolonged threatened filibuster by the representatives of the liquor interests in the Senate, if we would not consent to strike from the food administration legislation, now pending in the Senate, beer and wine, as he was very anxious that this legislation should speedily be enacted. The appeal was made in the name of patriotism.

We asked if the appeal had been made to the other side, and were informed that it was no use as Senators like PENROSE, of Pennsylvania, and his type, declared they would filibuster all summer before it should pass unless beer and wine were exempt. Knowing as we did that that traffic always puts personal gain over patriotism, we informed the Senator that if the President would put his request in writing, thus assuming the responsibility, we would give the matter careful consideration.

The inference to be drawn from the criticism is that the conference was held with men outside of Congress, as if it were not true that most of the conferences held by this administration are held with men and women outside of political or official life.

If these criticisms are intended to convey the impression that congressional action on the temperance question is determined by outside influence, it is sufficient reply to recall the action of the House on the 23d of last month, when it forbade the manufacture of any grains and fruits into alcoholic beverages—complete prohibition during the war—a step that was not even suspected by the men whose response to the known wish of the President offends the liquor press in the country.

The same fact is true in the action of the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, as to the blame for the delay in the food-control legislation: By a vote of the House, by a decisive majority, the food-control bill carries the prohibition of the further use during the war of grains for alcoholic beverages.

This bill with this provision in it carried in the House on a roll call by a vote of 365 for with but 5 against.

The Senate modified the commandeering features of the House bill by providing for the purchase by the Government of all the whisky now in bond at actual cost plus 10 per cent profit. That amendment was passed by a vote of 65 for and 12 against.

This amendment was proposed by a temperance advocate and supported by almost a solid temperance vote. Later in the day a vain effort was made to reconsider this vote, which was supported by 25 Members, most of whom are recorded with the liquor interests, on record votes on various other items of the bill.

The animus of the liquor interests as displayed in this attempted legislation is well displayed by these record votes. In the House the consideration by the Committee of the Whole, not permitting a record vote, their play in this body can not be so graphically detailed. But over in the other end of the Capitol we note the record as follows:

On the Cummins amendment, "No distilled liquors or spirits now in bond in the United States shall during the existing war be withdrawn to be used as a beverage," the vote was 45 for and 40 against.

On the Cummins amendment, "Nor shall there be imported into the United States during said war any distilled liquors," the vote was 69 for and 10 against.

These votes were taken on the afternoon of July 6. The next day the vote on the Smoot amendment, "Provided, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, directed to take over for and on behalf of the Government of the United States all distilled liquors that are held in bond at the time this act goes into effect, and he is hereby authorized to pay the owners of such liquors the actual cost of the same plus a profit not exceeding 10 per cent," was 65 for and 12 against.

Later in the day that part of the Cummins amendment prohibiting withdrawal of liquor for beverage purposes was reconsidered by a vote of 44 as against 39, and upon reconsideration was defeated by a vote of 39 for and 43 against, showing a strict alignment between the two forces.

With a defeat of the temperance force here an attempt was then made to reconsider the Smoot amendment, and failed by a vote of 25 for and 52 against reconsideration. This feature of the bill having been definitely settled, the liquor forces were thrown into a panic, and delay was consulted, with the well-known results.

The metropolitan press, whose policy is well known and understood, persists in the attempt to place this delay upon advocates of conservation of our grains against the manufacture of them into alcoholic beverages.

This attempt will fail, as is easily shown by the records of both Houses of Congress.

The bill came to the House on the 18th of June, was considered, amended, and passed on the 23d, after five days of deliberation. All of the five days save the latter part of the last day were consumed on other items of the bill. The prohibition section was the thirteenth, and was reached about 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 23d. The vote on the bill was taken just before adjournment on that day, which was about 11 o'clock that night. The charge of delay against the temperance forces in the House is ludicrous. The bill reached the Senate on the 25th and was at once referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It was reported back to the Senate with amendments and the Senate began its consideration on the 28th. On the 29th was begun its reading for consideration of committee amendments. On July 2 the prohibition question came into the Senate by the reading of a news item from one of the local papers criticizing the advocates of temperance for their alleged activity on behalf of conservation of grain. There were inserted in the RECORD of July 2, page 4585, copies of a letter from the President to the Anti-Saloon League and the league's reply:

JUNE 29, 1917.

MY DEAR DR. CANNON:

I am very glad to respond to the request of Senator MARTIN, the Democratic floor leader in the Senate, that I give your legislative committee an expression of my opinion with regard to the wisest and most patriotic policy to be purposed toward the food-administration legislation now pending in the Congress. I regard the immediate passage of the bill as of vital consequence to the safety and defense of the Nation. Time is of the essence; and yet it has become evident that heated and protracted debate will delay the passage of the bill indefinitely if the provisions affecting the manufacture of beer and wines are retained and insisted upon. In these circumstances I have not hesitated to say to Members of the Senate who have been kind enough to consult me that it would undoubtedly be in the public interest in this very critical matter if the friends of those provisions should consent to their elimination from the present measure. Feeling that your committee is actuated by the same patriotic motives which inspire me, I am confident that these considerations will seem to you, as they seem to me, to be imperative.

With much respect, sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Rev. JAMES CANNON, Jr., D. D.,
Chairman Legislative Committee Anti-Saloon League of America.

JUNE 30, 1917.

To the PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.:

We have earnestly considered the statement in your letter of yesterday to the legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America, that in the face of the present food crisis you are greatly concerned lest the early passage of the food administration legislation now pending in Congress be jeopardized by a heated and protracted debate upon certain sections of the bill relating to the manufacture of foodstuffs into intoxicating liquors.

We are aware of the threats made by the friends of beer and wine in the Senate of an indefinite and protracted filibuster against those provisions of the bill. We beg to assure you that as patriotic Americans, determined to uphold you as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in the present war, we will not for our constituents offer any obstruction to the prompt passage of the food-control bill.

Of course we can not presume to indicate to Members of Congress what action they should take in view of this request from the President of the United States They will doubtless act in accordance with their convictions of duty.

We are glad to note that your request applies only to the pending food-administration legislation. It will be our purpose to urge the passage of legislation prohibiting the waste of foodstuffs in the manufacture of beer and wines, at the earliest possible date, either in the form of a separate bill or in connection with other war legislation.

We assure you of our purpose as patriotic American citizens to cooperate in every possible way in the winning of the great war in which our Nation is engaged.

Sincerely and respectfully, yours,

P. A. BAKER,
General Superintendent.
EDWIN C. DINWIDDIE,
Legislative Superintendent.
JAMES CANNON, Jr.,
ARTHUR BARTON,
WAYNE B. WHEELER,
Legislative Committee.

The general opinion of the effect of the President's suggestion to omit the items of beer and wines from the prohibition section of the bill was expressed by the following telegram and its reply:

JACKSON, MISS., July 1, 1917.

Senator J. K. VARDAMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

We are depending on you to do your best for a bone-dry war measure. Do not exempt beer and wine.

MISSISSIPPI ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE,
Per T. J. BAILEY, Superintendent.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 1, 1917.

Rev. T. J. BAILEY,
Superintendent Anti-Saloon League, Jackson, Miss.:

Your telegram received.

The good old ship Prohibition, heavily loaded with the hopes of millions of consecrated women and men for Nation-wide prohibition, sailing with fair winds and good prospects to the port of victory, was submarined day before yesterday by the President of the United States. It is now lying on the bottom beneath about 40 fathoms of beer and wine, with one whole side knocked out. I am afraid some of the officers of the crew deserted before it went down. Will do my best to save the wreck. But it is my deliberate judgment that no power on earth except the people can raise it.

JAMES K. VARDAMAN.

On the same day the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains this item of procedure:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Tuesday, July 3, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 4961, a bill to provide further for the national security and defense, etc., through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that during said day, Tuesday, July 3, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto."

Mr. PENROSE. I object to any unanimous-consent agreement on the bill at the present time.

On July 3 the request to fix a time at which to vote in the Senate was objected to by the same Member of the Senate. On July 5 an agreement was reached to begin the consideration of the prohibition section at 2 o'clock, July 6, debate to be limited to but one speech of 10 minutes from any Senator. The time devoted to the bill up to this date was on parts other than prohibition. It was on this first day of the consideration of this provision that the Cummins amendments were passed. It was this vote, together with the Smoot amendment on the following day, the second day of consideration of prohibition, that the liquor forces in a panic began to play for time, and the RECORD indicates how they marched up the hill and down again, and which of the forces—the liquor or the temperance—occupied the time. The temperance crowd desired a vote and suggested, through one of the best-known temperance Senators, that the Senator in charge of the bill invoke the cloture rule. This suggestion was made on the 7th of July or the second day of the debate under the 10-minute rule. This is from page 4793 of the RECORD:

Mr. PENROSE (exhibiting). Here are some of the amendments to be offered to the bill. They have not even been read in the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And I do not think we will get along any faster in the future than we have done in the last three weeks unless some agreement is reached.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator that the section of the bill which it has been claimed heretofore has been causing delay has been disposed of under the unanimous-consent agreement. It can not be reserved even for a separate vote when the bill is out of Committee of the Whole.

I should like to see the bill passed. I am very anxious to have it passed. I know it is a very important measure and that time is of the essence in the matter. So I should like to see the Senator from Oregon either file his motion for cloture this evening or else keep the Senate in session for quite a while this evening in the hope that we may go on and consider some of the many amendments that the Senator from Pennsylvania has shown and that have not even been read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. At the suggestion of the Senator from Washington, I will file the cloture motion this evening, and then the Senators who are responsible for the delay in disposing of the bill can assume that responsibility by a record vote.

On the 9th another futile effort was made. Finally on the 10th, after vain efforts to reach an agreement, the motion for cloture was withdrawn and an agreement to vote on July 21 was reached.

So much on the delay of this bill and the cause of it and the responsibility for it. No man who knows will assert that the prohibition forces are delaying it.

Mr. Speaker, I have a series of resolutions adopted by the Ohio Grain Dealers' Association in convention at Toledo, June 27 of this year. This is the matter to which I referred at the outset. The one resolution of present pertinence is headed:

OBSTRUCTIVE LEGISLATION.

Resolved, That we are strongly opposed to the practice in Congress of attaching to bills, as amendments, matters that are foreign to the bills to which amendments are being attached, and matters that should be incorporated in special bills. This practice causes delays to legislation of the utmost importance, places our Congressmen in false positions, is unpatriotic and dangerous to the well-being of our country.

This resolution following an indorsement of the efforts of Mr. Hoover and many national undertakings looking to an efficient administration of an effective war policy, it is evident that those who wrote it were under the impression that this food-control bill was hindered by obstructive legislation. That may be, but no amount of effort on the part of the liquor interests or press will be able to fix that odium on the temperance forces of the country.

This bill came to the House as prepared by the Agricultural Committee, in conference with the department and in consultation with Mr. Hoover as well as the President of the Nation. It came as their proposal. Section 13, as reported, read as follows:

SEC. 13. That whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcohol or of alcoholic or nonalcoholic beverages, or such nonalcoholic beverages as he shall determine, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any beverage is essential in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food, he is authorized from time to time to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated. Whenever such notice shall have been given and shall remain unrevoked, no person shall, after a reasonable time, which shall be prescribed in the notice, use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcohol or of alcoholic or nonalcoholic beverages, except in accordance with the limitations, regulations, and prohibitions prescribed in such notice, or produce any beverage having an alcoholic content in excess of the amount prescribed therefor in such notice. Any person who willfully violates this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

That section made prohibition possible whenever the President so decreed. It was opposed by the liquor interests most strenuously when reached. The issue of prohibition thus introduced in the bill and made complete whenever, by proclamation of the President, he so decreed. Many Members, and I was included in that number, preferred to deal with this question directly by law, rather than by law pass it over to the President. We therefore offered to amend in the regular way by striking out of the section all except the following words: "No person shall use any foods, food material, or feeds in the production of alcoholic beverages," and we left the last paragraph in the section, making it a fine to violate the law. No man will say that this amendment was a rider, and no one can say the proponents of it were obstructionists because they offered it, unless he says the President and his committee are obstructionists, since they injected it at the outset. After the amendment was adopted, we perfected it by adding, after "alcohol," the words "except for governmental, industrial, scientific, medicinal, and sacramental purposes."

Mr. Speaker, to be specific, in answer to the charge that those of us who favor the conservation of our grains for food rather than for beverage purposes are delaying this legislation, let me repeat, that of the five days' consideration the House gave to the bill less than a day of that time was devoted to this question.

The Senate received the bill on the 28th from its committee, but the prohibition section was not reached until the 5th of July. The temperance forces in that body stood ready to vote on the issue, and even suggested the invocation of the cloture rule to force a vote. Yet in the face of these facts of record the innocent public are told by liquor agents and press that the delay in food-control legislation is due to prohibitionists. Let the Courier-Journal supply the backwash of the liquor interests:

And thus it is to-day that our own menaced land, our trusting allies beyond the sea, our envious and envenomed enemies at their throats, behold—it must be with amazement on the one side and amazement and glee on the other—the spectacle of our National Legislature in the grip of those who subordinate their sacred duty to our Army, our Navy, our militant citizenry, to the blackmailing opportunity to promote the intolerant purposes of fanaticism and of those politicians who would play to fanaticism.

Mr. Speaker, we are in the most cataclysmal world struggle conceived by mind. Its possibilities for danger have demanded the enlistment of the world's greatest thought, its keenest thinkers, its wisest doers of deeds; it has conscripted the flower of the Nation's greatest treasure; it will commandeer the resources of the Nation's numerous great captains of industry; it has laid its hands upon the consumers as well as producers of the country; it has turned all the channels of our resources into one current, and so guarded the national arteries that the vitals of the Republic will not unduly suffer; it has appealed to the farmer to produce his utmost and to the farmer's wife to save the crusts of bread, to establish wheatless and meatless days. In a word, this world contest, the brunt of which seems to be close to our door, compels America to face the possible consequences of an uncontrolled piracy of the seas, which threatens starvation of our allies with all its attendant consequences to follow.

This Congress is free to seize for the sake of a democracy all its resources, and without the consent of or even consultation with the owners, including the sons of the Republic from 21 to 31, this Congress is free to do all that; but we must not say to the liquor dealers, you can not continue to waste in alcoholic beverages grain and foodstuffs to the amount of 7,500,000,000 pounds per year, enough to feed an army. The conduct of these interests exhibited both in the press and in this Congress convinces me that the people of this country must take the business with a strangle hold. Like slavery in other days, every step to correct the evil is being and will be contested, and those who attempt to curb it are narrow minded, bigoted, pharisaical, and impudent in their interference with personal liberties.

The time is here when no man should hope to see a day when the liquor business will not invade every relation of life, especially political life, if it be to its interest to do so.

While the food-control bill provides prohibition for the period of the war, it is useless to pretend that the fight against this evil is to stop until it is ended right. That will not be until the business as a beverage industry is wholly destroyed. I have had a growing conviction for years that there is no other way. If ever I had any doubt of what my duty toward this palpable evil was, which I never have had, the procedure here in the Capitol during this war legislation has cleared the way as nothing in all my experience has done.

Could the American public view this program but one election would be necessary. At the worst this tenacity to pursue the devious course can not last many years. An institution driven from pillar to post as an outlaw can not long endure after the conscience of a nation has indicted it as wrong, the Courier Journal to the contrary notwithstanding.

As I said in the colloquy with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], I would be glad to see this property paid for at the actual cost plus a reasonable profit, if it can be reached by legislation such as was proposed in the Senate; but if this powerful influence continues to invade every circle and attempts to dominate, as it has in the past, and we are compelled to abolish it by Federal amendment, there will be no compensation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes further. I want to ask him one question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio have two minutes more.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, he has not asked it for himself. Therefore I object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, now, I do not think anyone can be cantankerous. So I shall have to make the point of no quorum. I make the point there is no quorum present.

Mr. LARSEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist on his point of no quorum?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will renew my request that the gentleman from Ohio have two minutes further. I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that we adjourn, if we have got to have a roll call here.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say for the benefit of my friend from Texas, and to relieve his apprehension, that my question has nothing to do with the liquor traffic.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am no friend of the liquor traffic.

Mr. CRAMTON. You seem to attempt to be.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not. And the gentleman has not heard me say anything that warrants that assertion.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I make the point of no quorum.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, July 14, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of the Navy, submitting an estimate of appropriation immediately required by the Naval Establishment for aviation purposes (H. By Mr. SNYDER: Memorial of H. T. Dyett, president Home Wire Co., Rome, N. Y., favoring flat tax on excess profits of corporations instead of a graduated levy; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 14, 1917.

(Legislative day of Thursday, July 12, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Smoot
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Pittman	Sterling
Curtis	Kendrick	Poindexter	Stone
Fletcher	Kenyon	Pomerene	Sutherland
France	King	Reed	Thompson
Gore	La Follette	Shafroth	Tillman
Gronna	McCumber	Sheppard	Vardaman
Hale	McKellar	Sherman	Walsh
Hollis	McNary	Simmons	Warren
Johnson, Cal.	Martin	Smith, Ariz.	Weeks
Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Williams

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. ASHURST], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. SHIELDS and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained on important business.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on important business.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is detained on important business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

THE CONQUERING AIR FLEET.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I read this morning in the Washington Post an editorial entitled "The conquering air fleet." It is to such an extent a clarion ring for speeding up legislation in order to prove ourselves effective and efficient in this great struggle that I ask to have it read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE CONQUERING AIR FLEET.

The House Committee on Military Affairs, with an Americanism that commands admiration, has considered and unanimously reported the bill which calls for an expenditure of $640,000,000 for immediately creating an airplane fleet that will give the United States command of the air.

This is courageous; it is magnificent; it is war.

Now, gentlemen of Congress, do your duty! Set aside everything but the victory of the United States over Germany! If any personal or factional suggestion occurs to you, smother it. If you see an amendment which by considerable debate might get you a little credit, forget it.

Any slacker can suggest a way to delay and amend and fail. It takes Americans to join hands and hearts, stifle their individual preferences, and rush forward to victory.

The American people don't care a rap about the defects of the airplane bill, if there are any defects. It is its splendid assurance of victory that they are interested in. Defects may be cured in short order by act of Congress, but the act of Congress that passes this bill is the act that counts.

Here is a way to win. Seize upon it, men of Congress! Don't postpone for a day the mighty preparations that this bill will put in action. The manhood of the Nation is eager to assemble and direct the forces that will annihilate the enemy. Go to it, Congress!

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 5405) making appropriations for certain session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

PETITIONS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Mount Clemens, Mich., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. GALLINGER) presented a petition of the Federal Labor Union of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for the early passage of the pending food bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the City Council of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the regulation of food prices, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASHEVILLE, N. C., July 10, 1917.

Senator K. D. McKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

The Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, composed of 105 of the leading daily newspapers of the South, in convention assembled to-day unanimously passed a resolution expressing the keenest sympathy with the Government's needs in the present extraordinary financial situation, the most cordial willingness to cooperate in raising the necessary additional revenues, and their desire to stand their just and fair proportion of the increased taxation. The convention, however, unanimously voiced the opinion that the proposed extra tax on the net revenues of newspapers, which does not apply to other lines of business, is unjust, unfair, and discriminatory. In reference to the proposed increase in second-class postage rates this association believes that it has no place in a revenue bill, and the proper rate or rates should be determined by an impartial investigation. If, however, an increase in postage rates is absolutely necessary at this time, this association believes that the only fair and equitable basis is the zone system, the theory of which is fully outlined in Senator McKELLAR'S amendment, with the present rate applying for the first 300 miles, which investigation has shown already affords the Government a profit, and increasing rates for longer distances in proportion to the cost to the Government for services rendered publishers.

CURTIS B. JOHNSON.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. GALLINGER):

A bill (S. 2647) granting an increase of pension to George O. Pearl (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 2648) for the relief of Barneybass Eastridge; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2649) granting an increase of pension to Louis M. Starring; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 2650) to authorize the county of Okanogan, in the State of Washington, to construct bridges within that county across the Okanogan River; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 2651) to place Henry La Motte upon the active list as surgeon in the Medical Corps of the Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RECENT DISTURBANCES IN EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to offer a concurrent resolution, and I ask that it be printed and go over under the rule.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 10) was submitted, as follows:

Whereas citizens of the United States have recently been killed by mob violence in East St. Louis, Ill., in the circumstances and in such numbers as to show underlying conditions of national significance, and indicating such weaknesses and lack of protection to citizens of the United States as to warrant an examination by an authority sufficiently powerful, impartial, and comprehensive, to ascertain the causes thereof: Therefore be it Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee of 10, consisting of 5 Members of the Senate and 5 Members of the House, to be named by the presiding officers thereof, be appointed to investigate the mob violence and riots in East St. Louis, Ill., and the causes thereof, and make a report of the same to Congress; that such committee shall have power and is hereby authorized to issue process and enforce the attendance of witnesses, the production of papers and documents, and all evidence which may shed any light upon the cause, and to fix the responsibility for the deaths of such citizens of the United States as were the victims of mob violence. The expenses of such investigation to be paid out of the contingent funds of each House in an equal sum.

That such investigating committee be, and is hereby, instructed to cooperate with the Department of Justice of the United States or of any State, and supplement the efforts of any such department not only to ascertain the reasons for such outbreak and the persons responsible therefor, but to secure punishment for those liable to criminal prosecution.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR LANE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, the 12th day of August, and the hour of 10.30 a. m. of that day, be set apart for holding memorial exercises to commemorate the public services of my late colleague, Senator LANE, of Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate convene on Sunday, August 12, 1917, at 10 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m., to consider resolutions in commemoration of the life, character, and public services of the late Senator HARRY LANE, of Oregon.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, in what I have to say I have no thought of saying anything that will especially contribute to the pleasure, still less to the enlightenment of the Senate, but what I have to say I wish to say because I desire on my own account to have it constitute a part of the RECORD.

Mr. President, it is not my intention to discuss the details of the bill before the Senate or of the substitute proposed therefor. I may have something to say later on about the bill and the substitute while we are considering the comparative merits of the two, but now I desire to address myself to the more general aspects of this legislation.

Mr. President, there are provisions in the pending bill—and that is the bill I now have particularly in mind—I do not like; indeed, there are provisions in it I could not think of supporting if presented at a time when normal national conditions prevailed. I am not unappreciative of the pertinency and force of the criticisms of the bill made by several distinguished Senators. I confess myself unable to make a satisfactory reply to some of these criticisms. I have no doubt the Senators who make these criticisms are performing a patriotic and useful service to the country, at least in this way, by calling public attention to the legislative trend, with which we are becoming familiar, of the growing disregard of the Constitution of the United States, and of a growing indifference to those theories of government which heretofore we have esteemed to be fundamental and essential to the integrity of the Nation and the safety of the people.

I have said there are provisions in this bill I do not like, and I might add that the same thing is true of other bills—so-called war bills—we have recently passed, and which I voted for. I voted for those bills in the belief—although I confess it was a hesitating belief—that it was best in the circumstances. In like spirit I shall vote for this bill; and this I say with full knowledge that it is a dangerous thing to establish bad precedents even under exceptional circumstances or abnormal conditions. They are apt to return to plague us. I can only hope that I may not hereafter be arraigned in the court of conscience or be held to a too strict accountability by a newly aroused and revitalized public judgment, or by posterity. If the more objectionable features of the bill can be removed or modified by amendment, all the better; but however that may be, in the final analysis, it is my present purpose to vote in favor of passing this bill as finally agreed upon into law. After making this apparently somewhat inconsistent explanation, it behooves me to state my position more definitely.

I have already, more than once, voiced my general attitude with respect to this whole war business, but I think it opportune and in a personal sense necessary to restate it. Moreover, as we progress along this line of legislative enactment I may deem it necessary to again restate, perhaps more than once, the attitude I have taken, may I not say from the beginning, with respect to these matters.

Mr. President, I have divided this speech which I am making into three sections. I have now reached the first section, which relates to objections that have been urged against this legislation on constitutional grounds.

I. CONSTITUTIONAL OBJECTIONS.

Senators for whom I have high respect, and to whose judgments I am accustomed to pay deference, protest that this bill contains essential features which are in conflict with the Constitution. As already stated, I am not prepared to controvert that contention. I fear that there are provisions in the bill we have before us—provisions crudely conceived and hastily improvised—which the most casual student of the Constitution would consider violative of that instrument. The same thing might well be said of other bills we have enacted since our declaration of war. And this reflection brings me to this thought—a thought I wish again to impress:

You know, Mr. President, as every Senator and the country knows, I was resolutely opposed to plunging this country into this foreign, far-away European war. You are bound to know how deep my conviction on that subject must have been to have taken the action I did, since I knew, as everyone knew—and none knew so well as I—what the almost inevitable and immediately hurtful personal consequences of that action would be to me. Nevertheless I warned you and the country against that fateful step, voted against taking it, and have suffered the anticipated personal consequences. I warned you and the country then that if we insisted upon this course we would open a Pandora's box, the multiplying evils of which no man was wise enough to forecast. When a mere handful of Senators opposed this headlong rush to the battle fronts of Europe and resisted the remarkable scheme advanced to have the Congress abdicate their constitutional functions and turn over to the Executive not only the power to wage war but practically to declare war and, in substantial effect, to administer all the constitutional powers of the Government, some 80 Senators or more passionately affixed their signatures to what may be called a "legislative round robin," by which they nailed to the cross those who did not believe in war and were unwilling to follow in the wake of their leadership. But from the beginning I have stated over and again that, while I looked with horror upon the proposal to involve this country in this foreign war, I would nevertheless loyally accept the joint judgment of the Congress and the President, if they should, acting together, declare for war; and from that day forth I have stood steadfastly in support of the dominating forces of the Government which declared that war was necessary. That is the position I took at the outstart, and I shall abide by it.

The Congress declared war, thereby authorizing and directing the President, as Commander in Chief, to prosecute the war with the greatest possible vigor to a successful termination. Holding still many doubts and scruples in reserve, I shall support the President and the Government in organizing our national resources and in using them to the utmost of our strength.

At this late day, after we have deliberately involved ourselves in this tremendous tumult, Senators become deeply troubled about the Constitution. I fear this trouble comes too late. It is most unfortunate that this troublous shadow did not fall athwart the Senate at a somewhat earlier day. Undoubtedly bills are being passed, one after another, which in some of their essential particulars would in ordinary times be denounced as subversive of the clear mandates of the Constitution. But we have been told in the course of the Senate debates that in a time of war like this we can properly and constitutionally pass laws to further the objects of the war, which laws in normal times would be universally condemned and denounced as unconstitutional. This remarkable contention has been strongly urged by Senators in our hearing, some of whom are highly esteemed for their erudition as lawyers; and the executive and legislative branches of the Government appear to have accepted this view—the meaning of which is that the Constitution is at least in some large measure suspended by the mere fact that a state of war exists—and we have been and still are proceeding on that theory and basis.

Mr. President, I think it would not be an incorrect statement to say that, in so far as the lawmaking power is concerned, the Constitution, crucified, lies in a state of suspended animation—at least temporarily moribund. Whether this old charter of our liberties shall ever arise, revitalized, I do not certainly know. The judiciary is the one remaining constitutional coordinate power of the Government which, so far as we know, is yet free from revolutionary influence and which may, at a later day, open the door to the sepulcher. There may be a resurrection. Mr. President, times do come in the lives of nations when one may say, in the words of Marcus Antonius—

> O judgment! thou art fled to brutish beasts,
> And men have lost their reason.

Whether, when they shall be called upon, the judges will stand unbending for the Constitution, as they have often stood for it in the past, firmly maintaining its limitations in preserving our established form of government and in making secure the rights of the private citizen, or whether they too shall join the legislative mob in the onward rush toward constitutional demolition and revolutionary change in our fundamental ideals, remains to be seen. The judges can not speak until the ill-considered things we shall do here—sometimes doing them passionately, but more often doing them under the sharp prod of extraneous influences—are brought before them in due form for their deliberate and solemn judgment. For that we shall have to wait.

In the meantime, so far as I can find it possible to do so, it is my desire and purpose to support the Government in promoting the supreme thing we now have in hand to do, and that is to make certain the succesful prosecution of the war to the most speedy ending.

II. AUTOCRACY AND ARISTOCRACY.

Mr. President, this war program of legislation we are engaged upon, of which this bill is a typical example, is also criticized by Senators and outside commentators on the ground that, while we are making war avowedly to crush the ambitious autocracy of Germany, we are in the prosecution of that enterprise building an autocracy of our own whose far-extended reach puts it upon a plane which in essential particulars is little below the most arbitrary pretensions of the Kaiser's Government itself. I am not competent to wage issue on that contention. The contention, I am sorry to say, has too much the present semblance of truth; but can that be helped? There is one line of differentiation between the two quite obvious to me—and that line is not only of paramount importance but very comforting—namely, that the extraordinary powers the Congress are assuming for themselves and conferring on the Executive are extraordinary powers intended merely to serve a present purpose, and that these extraordinary powers will be temporary in duration, and not permanent, whereas we contend that the autocratic powers of the Imperial German Government are a permanent part of that Government—ingrafted upon its very organism.

I hope that this line of differentiation is accurately drawn, and especially do I hope—yes, and believe—that that line will not be forgotten or obliterated after the war. I so hope because surely it can not be that we mean permanently to change our form of Government. Surely it can not be that we are making an unwritten constitution, after the English plan, to supplant that which is written. I know that the things we are doing are pregnant of perilous future possibilities, but I feel that now we are almost compelled to go forward. I do not see how we can halt or retrace our steps until the reverberating echoes of the last hostile gun have ceased to disturb the peace of the world. Beyond that day I look with hope and faith that the liberty-loving people of our own America will readjust our national life upon old familiar lines, drawn within those limitations of constitutional power for which we have stood for more than a century, and which we have firmly and zealously maintained for the preservation of liberty and a real democracy.

Mr. President, I hate autocratic rule, I hate aristocratic rule, and fear both. I abominate kings, kaisers, czars, and emperors—royalty in any guise—and beyond these, looking downward, I can not avoid an inborn feeling—I hesitate to say a feeling of contempt, but of unspeakable dislike for all such human things as princes, dukes, lords, and others like them of minor degree who hold hereditary title under royal patent to bestride the world, as it were, that the working and really creative forces of men should pass between their outstretched legs, as between the legs of some bestriding Colossus, and lay tribute at their feet.

All these lordly gentlemen, of whatever land or caste, look alike to me. I am blind to any essential difference between them. I would strip every man of them of his toggery, his haughty pretensions, and ill-gotten privileges, and send him about his business to make an honest living by his own hand and brain, and to exist like other men. True it is that some of these aristocrats do real service to the State; but most of them are little more than incubi on the body politic. They feed on the public and lord it over the people. Always they assume an attitude of superiority and mastery. Even those who serve with credit could serve as well and with greater honor, as men like Gladstone, the great Commoner, served, as untitled private citizens. There should be no such thing as a select, aristocratic, much less autocratic, class in government. No man or class of men should be entitled to rule by heredity. Mr. President, whenever shall we reach a point in world development when the body politic can be freed from political and even social fungi? May the plain people not hope to reach that end at the end of this war? At all events I declare most positively that our part in this war—whether in the waging or at the ending—should in no wise conflict with the great principles of human democracy I here reproclaim.

Mr. President, I was glad to pay respect to the French mission when they recently visited Washington, because they represented a people who, after long years of travail, bloodshed, and heroic effort, put an end to royalty, autocracy, and aristocracy in France, and upon the wreck of those old oft filthy and always oppressive public evils builded a great democracy imbued with the spirit of universal liberty and equality. I was equally glad also to pay respect to the Russian mission, because they, too, represented a great people, who out of the volcanic upheavals of this stupendous war have swept a royal master from his throne, and are striving—I hope in God's providence striving successfully—to construct a great and true democracy on the ruins of an autocracy which has brutalized Russia for centuries. Here at least is one blessing this frightful war promises to mankind. I pray Heaven that a still greater harvest of this kind may be garnered for the good of men all over the world wherever royalty lifts its sinister standard before this old globe of ours shall again peacefully swing in its accustomed orbit.

Mr. President, while the war is on and waged as it now is waged, although not unmindful of the expressed apprehensions of Senators and fully alive to the possible dangers of the future, I see no loyal way for me to go except to support the President and those associated with him in the conduct of the war. The future is always uncertain, but my guiding star in this night of doubt is the Star of Faith. I grope, but I shall go forward. I shall go forward in the hope of rendering some service to make the future what it should be.

My one great present desire is to aid the Government in bringing this war to a speedy end. I say this in the midst of this world clamor, because I see no chance for the unshaken champions of real democracy to be even heard with patience until the war is ended.

III. PEACE—WHEN AND HOW?

Mr. President, when and how is peace possible? Before we entered into the war I believed this Government held in its hand the power of commanding peace between the warring nations of Europe. I believed, based on my knowledge of the situation, that then we could have resolutely approached all the belligerents on the just ground that our vital national interests and the vital interests of the neutral world were so involved that we had, as the most powerful representative of neutral nations, a right to speak in the interest of world peace. Possibly I may be wrong, but I believe that we could have laid down to the several belligerent powers a basis of peace absolutely just to all, including ourselves, that none of the belligerent powers could have rejected—that none could have dared to reject—because we could have assumed such an attitude with respect to the whole subject, backed by the neutral nations if we had sought their support, as would have enabled us to propose a basis of peace so just that it would have been impossible for any of the belligerents to have refused to cooperate with us in our effort to establish peace. It is bootless at this time to outline in detail the stand we might have taken in this behalf. I thought, and still think, we held in our hands that balance of power that could have enforced a world peace. I believe that it is still within our power to bring about world peace without serious further sacrifice of blood or treasure. That is my personal belief, about which I have no doubt. However, I will not now elaborate these ideas, because it would be useless. Our Government is no longer a Government of peace, but of war. It would be madness to overlook that obvious fact. The preachment of "peace without victory" has been changed to the preachment of "peace only with victory." That is our present governmental attitude. I recognize that we are in this behalf confronting a condition, not a theory. We had as well understand now as later that there will be no peace until the German Government lift their hands in token of surrender. Germany must be crushed before we shall again call the rising sun to light the day of peace. Do you doubt that I am stating the exact situation as it now is? It may be that something may later occur to change the President's attitude, and if the President changes his attitude the Congress will change their attitude, but not otherwise. To my vision the prospect of peace on any basis different from that I have indicated appears only as a faint glimmer on the horizon of hope. There is no need for sane men to deceive themselves about that. If what I say is true, then we are brought to a point of clear understanding to this effect: That unless the President modifies his attitude there will be no peace until our arms are crowned with victory on the battle fields of Europe. When will that event occur, as sooner or later it is bound to occur? I say bound to occur, because with the tremendous overwhelming forces arrayed against the Teutonic combine, there can be but one end to the war as I see it. The German powers must yield.

Therefore it follows that the sooner victory comes to our arms the sooner the world will come to its senses and to some just basis of permanent peace. The sooner this is accomplished the sooner the world can begin to adjust itself to the new conditions which are to arise out of this conflict, and, perhaps more important, the sooner our own people can begin the work of restoring their own governmental autonomy on lines consistent with their Constitution and national ideals. I see no way of bringing all this world turmoil to an end and thus arriving at the point of world readjustment and national readjustment except by employing to the utmost limit all the vast powers of this Nation, cooperating with those with whom we are by force of circumstances associated, to end the war. And, as I see it, the sooner this end can be reached the better for all. Dealing with this situation as it appears to me, I rest under the compelling conviction that the best present service I can render my country and mankind is to aid the Government of the United States in every way possible to add the full contribution of its mighty power to force peace by the arbitrament of the sword. After that I believe the people of the United States and the thoughtful people of the world will begin to take their bearings. At this time we are on the bosom of a tumultuous sea where none can measure heights or depths. It is imperative that the world must reach a period of greater calm and sanity, and that period is not within sight on this side the termination of the war.

Mr. President, what I have said in a way expresses my view and attitude. In the interest of peace, of humanity, of better world conditions, and especially in the interest of restoring our own national normality, I see nothing I can do better calculated to promote these ends than to give my unreserved support to the Government as constituted in prosecuting the war with the greatest possible vigor to a speedy and successful conclusion. This I have said more than once; this, I repeat again, and this I shall do. Accordingly, I shall support this legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in so far as a part of what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has just said is a clarion call to duty to "stiffen our sinews and summon up our courage" to see this thing through to a successful issue, I agree with him most emphatically, but there is a part of what he said which is an iridescent dream, and I can not permit it to pass without entering my protest. There never was a month or a week or an hour or a minute when this country could have suggested terms for a just and lasting peace which would not have been scorned at the court of Berlin by the Kaiser and his military and bureaucratic entourage. That sort of a thing is a mere dream of what might have been, a picture of what can not be, not even now, much less then. It will remain a dream until the time when we shall have demonstrated to Germany that behind an eloquent tongue there is a mailed fist.

We not only could not have laid down any terms for a just and lasting peace which would have been accepted, but we could not even lay down any terms to prevent the sinking of our own ships upon the high seas while we were neutral. We could not have laid down anything that would not be kicked out of court at Berlin. Why? Because that crowd had a perfect contempt for the American Government and for the American people, the contempt that the skilled and prepared boxer has for a heavy beefy fellow who can not assert himself. That was their view of us. That is their view of us yet; and that will remain their view of us until upon the plains of France or upon the high seas we indicate that there is something else to us. It was the contempt that a prepared athlete has in a cause even unjust for an antagonist whose muscles are flabby, whose preparation has been nothing, and whose antagonism can, in the opinion of the athlete, be ignored.

I say that because otherwise a part of what the Senator from Missouri has just said might be a reflection upon the President and the administration—not intended but in effect. The President and the administration did do everything that human intellect could conceive for the purpose, if possible, of bringing an end to the war, and especially of keeping us out of it. We did everything that we had a right to do. The President came to this Chamber and made that speech which was criticized not only abroad but here in this Chamber as being "a peace-at-any-price speech," the celebrated speech in which he said we must have "peace without victory." He traveled the whole gamut up and down. He allowed this Nation to suffer humiliation after humiliation, shame piled upon shame, grazed the very edge of cowardice, because his heart beat in unison with the cause of a just and lasting peace, and in pitying love for suffering humanity.

Now, we are in it—the Senator is right in the balance of what he says—we have got to see it through, and, as the darkies down South say, see it "plumb through." We have got to see it through not only to a successful issue of this war but while we are about it to a just and permanent treaty, under whose comprehensive terms we shall as far as possible make war cease to be a game of national athletes. We have got to see it through to a point where the world can hope that there shall be peace for some generations at any rate—to a point where the civilized world shall say to any nation which goes to war without having previously submitted the cause in controversy, or proposed to submit it to fair and impartial arbitrament, "You are an outlaw nation; you are no longer within the pale of international law; you are outside the pale of civilization; you are everybody's enemy; we shall treat you as such until you come back to your senses. We are tired of this."

We do not propose in time of peace to prepare for war always. We propose now in times of war to prepare for peace, and for a just and lasting peace, and we are going through with it with men and money and ships. We are to see it through on land and on sea and in the air above them both and under the sea, until we have reached the goal not only of peace but of a just and lasting peace, a righteous peace. Old Thomas Jefferson said at one time that "no man was responsible for the rightfulness of his opinion, but every man was responsible for the righteousness of it." So it is with nations.

Now, I agree with the Senator from Missouri. It seems to me that we have been as Senators indulging in endless verbalities, endless criticism, endless attention to minutiæ and to small matters.

The House committee has just reported to the House a bill to spend some $600,000,000 for aeroplanes and see what we can do in this war in the quickest possible way. I hope, and I have reason to hope from what I have heard, that the House will pass it through without waiting to consider every "if" and "but" and "and" in every provision of the bill. If it is not perfectly right, it can be made right, but the main thing is to make a start. Let the Senate be guided by its example. Talks may be silvern, but votes are golden.

When somebody is rushing at me with both fists prepared I have not time to criticize the attitude of my own fists or person. The thing is to meet him, and to meet him as well as I can and as quickly as I can and as forcibly as I can.

Mr. President, the country is not unaware of what we have been doing, and the country is also not unaware of what we have not been doing, when we might have been doing something. This is the Armageddon, the war of all the nations of all the world, everybody at everybody's throat, and we have spent three months in merely initiating the legislation that is to start off the carrying on of our part of this war. We have spent three months in passing the legislation necessary to start to mobilize men, money, and resources, so that we might prove in the beginning, after the legislation, a factor in this struggle. Men may cry peace, as the old Revolutionary hero said, "Peace, peace, but there is no peace." For six months before we went into this struggle there was no peace, and every man with a long vision knew it. The only mistake that we have made is that we did not get into it in time. Liberty and democracy all over the world may be deprived of "a place under the sun" as the ultimate result of this struggle because we did not have a vision long enough to get into it in time.

The Senator from Missouri is right. There is nothing to do now except to go forward—not even to look backward or to look to either side.

Gentlemen tell me that certain things are unconstitutional because they would be unconstitutional in peace times. Other extremists, on the other side, say that we have certain "war powers." Neither is true. The Constitution stands unchanged, but in its applicability to things it applies to them according to the condition in which the things are at the time of the application. There are hundreds of things that are thoroughly constitutional in time of war in carrying out the behest of the Constitution to "support an army and navy" and to "carry on war" which would be not only absurd but really unconstitutional in times of peace, for the simple reason that in times of war the exercise of the power is proper and necessary in order to accomplish a constitutional end, which is to support armies and navies and carry on war, and in times of peace, the constitutional end being nonexistent, can not evoke and justify the means. The things that are constitutional for carrying on a war are unconstitutional when no war is being carried on.

In times of peace the same things will be neither necessary nor proper, because the task would be a different one. Everybody knows, or ought to know, the difference between a peace establishment and a war establishment.

There are just two classes of people in America, and the sooner we find it out the better. One is loyal to the American Republic and wants to win this war. Whatever is to be suffered, it is willing to suffer; whatever it shall cost it is willing to pay; whatever must be endured it is willing to endure.

The other side is consciously or unconsciously disloyal and untrue, not only to the American Republic but to the cause of liberty throughout the world, which is involved in this war. The President is right. We must see it through, and see it through to where democracy shall have a safe place in this world. That can not be done, Mr. President, so long as there exists anywhere enthroned or vested with authority any man controlling any great national destiny who is insane enough—for it is a form of insanity, and it is nothing else—to believe, first, that government is an independent entity, not a mere creature of man for man's use, but a separate thing with separate rights and separate duties outside of the pale of morals and the moral law; and, in the second place, that he, thus enthroned, "rules by divine right"; that God is his intimate partner, while the balance of us have no partnership with God at all.

"Summon up your courage," "stiffen your sinews," "show the metal of your posture," realize that this war is the most gigantic struggle that this country was ever engaged in, not even excepting the Revolution, because if we had failed in that we would still have been colonies of that country which, whatever the objections to it might have been or may be, was and is the freest country in the world, except our own and some of its self-governing colonies. We would have been in no worse condition to-day than Canada is. This struggle is even more serious than was the Civil War, because, even had the South been victorious, there would have been two free countries upon this hemisphere, with miserable customhouses between us, and the keeping up of armies out of suspicion of one another, and other immense disadvantages; but still there would have been two free countries and two democracies without kings or nobles.

You lose this fight, and the road is made clear from Berlin to Bagdad; from Belgrade, upon the Danube, down to Saloniki, on the Ægean and across to Asia Minor, for the Government of the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgers and Junkerdom. Lose it and one of two things is going to happen—you can either bid eternal farewell to democracy on this earth, its place to be taken by a new world empire, under whose shadow all will be vassals, or else you can make out of America, as Europe has made out of herself, an armed camp, sitting and watching all the time like a panther in his lair, ready to spring at your throat whenever you are off guard, and when the opportunity for booty, pelf, and power seems good to the descendants of the Goths and Vandals and Huns.

What is the use of fooling with any of these "ifs" and "buts" and "notwithstandings" and "moreovers" and "whereases"? Get the substance of what you want in the grand outline and put it through. Meet the enemy as the enemy meets us—with every man and every resource and every form of national virility and vitality.

You need not deceive yourselves. Our boys and men have got to go to the trenches and have got to be killed, have got to be maimed, and perhaps be buried upon foreign soil. It may be that you can not even bring them back to the plantation and put them in the family graveyard with a loving inscription on their tombs. When you consider that and what it amounts to them and to us, what does all this stuff you are talking about here amount to—questions of money and procedure, stupid verbalities. I started to say "linked sweetness long drawn out," but it is not even sweetness; it is linked nonsense long drawn out; worse than that, the verbalities are not even "linked" together. The very air is surfeited with them and sick.

War is war, and the man who attempts to carry on war upon the same principles that would guide him in peace times in ordinary legislation is either lacking in acuteness of vision or he is lacking in loyalty to the country in behalf of which he wants the war to be carried on. "Hew to the line; let the chips fly as they may." See this thing through first; see it through not to a peace only which might be merely an armistice and a preparation by a breathing spell for or continuation of this eternal curse of national armed camps all over the world, of which Great Britain and we, the two branches of the English-speaking race, must after this war become a party—though hitherto we have avoided it—not to a mere peace, which may be only a sound and a word and a name, but a just and lasting peace, bottomed upon the rights of nationalities, bottomed upon the rights of those who speak the same language, not to be repressed and oppressed by others, and bottomed above all upon justice and righteousness and the acknowledged obligation of sacred international compacts.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am glad to find myself in hearty accord with the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] as to the necessity for a vigorous prosecution of this war. The patriotic determination of the Senator from Missouri to support the pending bill and the administration in the prosecution of the war does him all the more credit, because at the same time he expresses misgivings as to where we shall be led with reference to the Constitution of the United States.

I am glad to say further that I do not share his misgivings as to the Constitution, but I agree entirely with the sentiments just expressed by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

To conduct a successful war we must have a strong Army, a powerful Navy, and a tranquil, prosperous people. No army will be strong, no navy will be powerful, and no people will be tranquil and prosperous unless there is available for their use at moderate prices an adequate supply of food, fuel, and other necessaries.

The President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy and the Executive in Chief of the Federal laws. It is the duty of Congress to raise revenues, make appropriations, and pass necessary and proper laws for the common defense and general welfare.

Since the existing laws have failed to assure an adequate supply of necessaries at moderate prices it is necessary to pass additional laws to achieve that much desired result. We must give the Chief Executive extraordinary powers during the pendency of the war to meet the special emergencies that confront us. This is the plain duty of Congress.

In considering the details of the pending food bill we may well differ. I do not address myself to the details at this time. I desire briefly to discuss the power of Congress to pass such reasonable and necessary administrative laws as it believes to be wise in the present crisis.

It would be highly diverting to ring the changes once more on the familiar decisions of our Supreme Court dealing with the powers of the President and of Congress. Some nice distinctions might be indicated, many acute inferences might be drawn, and places might even be pointed out where the work of the fathers might be improved upon. For the lawyer who delights to split hairs the occasion for indulging in his favorite diversion is well-nigh irresistible.

But war can not be successfully conducted by a debating club. War is not a legislative, but an administrative task. We take too much unction to ourselves when we imagine that the people look to us in this crisis to be especially zealous in defense of their constitutional rights. The people will resume after the war any liberties that have been impaired while the fighting is on. Unless we save the Nation from destruction we shall have no Constitution to engage our anxious care.

The country is not afraid of enslavement or oppression at the hands of President Wilson or of Mr. Hoover. The country is afraid that Congress will disregard the imperative demand to do everything possible to win this war. If any man's constitutional rights are infringed in the process, he will be amply compensated through the courts or by Congress. But there will be no hearing for the Congress which fails promptly and generously to supply the powers and sinews of war. The country does not fear masters; it fears cowards and sluggards. It desires Congress to give the President all the power and all the money he wants, heaped up and running over, and then to adjourn and preserve a very impressive silence and permit the President as Commander in Chief to conduct the common defense, and as Chief Executive to administer the laws for the public welfare.

Congress is well equipped to pass a law empowering the President to select and commission a food administrator, but Congress is not the appropriate constitutional instrument to decide whether Mr. Hoover or some one else is the best man to fill that office. It is my own opinion that the people want Mr. Hoover and will gladly follow his lead in matters of food control. And the people are usually right in their judgment of public men. But of one thing we may be sure, if Mr. Hoover does not administer the food business of the country with conspicuous success, the President will displace him as readily as he will displace the unsuccessful leader of an army in the field.

The President asks us to pass laws to enable him to handle the food, fuel, and necessaries situation effectively and for the benefit of the Army, the Navy, the people, and our allies. It gets us nowhere to debate whether the President could exercise an efficient control over the distribution of necessaries without these laws. It gets us nowhere to debate whether Congress would have the power to pass these laws in time of peace.

The President does not intend to exercise the powers desired by him until Congress grants them. We are most certainly at war. The only questions then are first, whether we have a right to confer the powers in war times, and, second, whether we think it wise as a matter of legislative discretion to confer them.

I shall waste no time on the question of exercising the discretion, if we have it. The Senate will pass this bill by an overwhelming vote when the last oratorical gun has sounded.

On the question of our power under the Constitution to pass the law, I venture the assertion that every attempt by Congress to pass laws as war measures has been eventually upheld by the Supreme Court. There can be no doubt that this law will be held constitutional. The chances are strong that it will never be challenged in the courts.

Many cases have been cited which establish the right of Congress to pass measures of the same general character as this.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] covered the ground fully in their constitutional arguments on the bill. No case has been cited, and none will be found, which denies the right of Congress to pass such a measure in war time.

It is true that the food question has never become serious in the United States during previous wars. Consequently food legislation of this character has not been passed. We have no exact precedent for it; it is an innovation; but we need have no concern because it is an innovation. We are concerned only to decide whether the benefits to be derived from the innovation as a war measure are likely to be sufficient to outweigh the inconveniences and injuries that may result. It is a very simple problem, and one that this body could perfectly well decide without looking at a law book.

It is a waste of time, moreover, to debate whether the Constitution is suspended in war time. No one asks to suspend it for the purpose of accomplishing the object we have in view. If any private property is taken, it will be paid for at a fair price under the compensation clause of the Constitution.

Nothing will be taken except by due process of law. We are now engaged in enacting into law the various due processes which we purpose to employ.

We shall not impair the obligation of contracts, except incidentally, as we do under the bankruptcy law, so that no question of constitutional prohibition is involved under that head.

Mr. President, it is interesting to note how easily those who now fear for the Constitution brushed aside a plain provision of the Constitution when the bill authorizing priorities of shipment on railroads was before the Senate. That bill authorizes the President to require a railroad to carry a less profitable class of freight when a more profitable class is offered. Such action by the President will diminish the earnings of the road, and thus deprive it of a part of its property, for transportation is the only thing the railroad has to sell. Depriving the railroad of its property without just compensation is a plain violation of the Constitution. The friends of that measure desired to provide just compensation in accordance with the Constitution, but those who now insist upon the sacredness of that immortal charter of our liberties refused to permit the railroad law to pass until the compensation feature had been stricken out. Some of them are inexpressibly shocked when the same treatment is extended to whisky distillers.

It is needless to cite cases where provisions of the Constitution have been set aside under martial law. I fully realize that we are not now discussing that phase of the question; but the position that the Constitution never yields to the necessities of war is shattered when we show a single exception. A case squarely in point is Luther v. Borden (7 How., 1), decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1849. It was there held that the constitutional guaranties against search and seizure do not prevail when martial law has been declared by the proper authority.

I have not heard the case of Luther against Borden referred to during the debate in the Senate on this bill, and I may be pardoned for making more than a passing reference to it. The case grew out of Dorr's rebellion in the State of Rhode Island. There was there a contest between two State governments in the year 1842. Each faction claimed to be the proper government, and one of them, which claimed to have control of the legislature, passed a law declaring martial law throughout the State of Rhode Island. An officer of the militia broke into a house without a warrant and arrested one of the opposite faction; so the case presented the question of the right to set aside the provision of the Rhode Island constitution and of the United States Constitution forbidding search and seizure without warrant in times when martial law has been declared.

The dissenting opinion in that case was written by Mr. Justice Woodbury, of my own State; and those who are opposing the pending bill on constitutional grounds could not put the case any more strongly than Levi Woodbury put it. He said on pages 66 and 67:

> In most of our legislatures, also, as in Rhode Island, in A. D. 1798, by a fundamental law, there has been incorporated into their constitutions prohibitions to make searches for papers or persons without a due warrant, and to try for offenses except by indictment, unless in cases arising in the Army or Navy or militia themselves.
> The genius of our liberties holds in abhorrence all irregular inroads upon the dwelling houses and persons of the citizen, and with a wide jealousy regards them as sacred, except when assailed in the established and allowed forms of municipal law. Three of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States were adopted, under such influences, to guard against abuses of power in those modes by the General Government, and evidently to restrict even a modified "martial law" to cases happening among military men or the militia when in actual service. For one of them, amendment fourth, expressly provides that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." The others are amendments third and fifth.

And then he goes on, on page 70:

> It looks, certainly, like pretty bold doctrine in a constitutional government that, even in time of legitimate war, the legislature can properly suspend or abolish all constitutional restrictions, as martial law does, and lay all the personal and political rights of the people at their feet. But bolder still is it to justify a claim to this tremendous power in any State, or in any of its officers, on the occurrence merely of some domestic violence.

But this "bolder still" doctrine was upheld by the United States Supreme Court in the majority opinion, Woodbury alone dissenting. I will quote one more paragraph from the dissenting opinion before referring to the majority opinion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if Judge Woodbury, in the very strong and able dissenting opinion referred to, and one in which there is a clear statement of what warrants martial law, and the application of constitutional rights thereunder, did not predicate his dissent somewhat upon the ground that there was not sufficient reason for the establishment of martial law in the circumstances of the case? That is my recollection of the opinion.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is perfectly true. He did, in part, base his dissent on that position; but I am merely reading from his opinion, because these extracts sound so much like the arguments we have heard in opposition to our constitutional right to pass the pending bill.

I now read again from page 62:

It—

Martial law—

> exposed the whole population, not only to be seized without warrant or oath, and their houses broken open and rifled, and this where the municipal law and its officers and courts remained undisturbed and able to punish all offenses, but to subject prisoners thus summarily arrested in a civil strife to all the harsh pains and penalties of courts-martial or extraordinary commissions and for all kinds of supposed offenses. By it every citizen, instead of reposing under the shield of known and fixed laws as to his liberty, property, and life, exists with a rope around his neck, subject to be hung up by a military despot at the next lamp-post, under the sentence of some drumhead court-martial.

That paragraph particularly reminds us of many things we have heard in the Senate in the last two or three weeks. But in reply to that statement, Chief Justice Taney, in the majority opinion, on page 45, said:

> And unquestionably a State may use its military power to put down an armed insurrection, too strong to be controlled by the civil authority. The power is essential to the existence of every Government, essential to the preservation of order and free institutions, and is as necessary to the States of this Union as to any other Government. The State itself must determine what degree of force the crisis demands. * * * It was a state of war; and the established Government resorted to the rights and usages of war to maintain itself, and to overcome the unlawful opposition. And in that state of things the officers engaged in its military service might lawfully arrest anyone, who, from the information before them, they had reasonable grounds to believe was engaged in the insurrection; and might order a house to be forcibly entered and searched, when there were reasonable grounds for supposing he might be there concealed. Without the power to do this, martial law and the military array of the Government would be mere parade, and rather encourage attack than repel it. No more force, however, can be used than is necessary to accomplish the object.

I wish to put in the RECORD one quotation from the Vallandigham case. The case was referred to in the House, but it has not been referred to in the Senate so far as I recall. In that case—Ex parte Vallandigham, Twenty-eighth Federal cases, 874, at page 921—the judge delivering the opinion said:

> In my judgment, when the life of the Republic is imperiled, he mistakes his duty and obligation as a patriot who is not willing to concede to the Constitution such a capacity of adaptation to circumstances as may be necessary to meet a great emergency and save the Nation from hopeless ruin. Self-preservation is a paramount law, which a nation, as well as an individual, may find it necessary to invoke. Nothing is hazarded in saying that the great and far-seeing men who framed the Constitution of the United States supposed they were laying the foundation of our National Government on an immovable basis. * * * They did, however, distinctly contemplate the possibility of foreign war, and vested in Congress the power to declare its existence, and "to raise and support armies" and "provide and maintain a Navy." They also made provision for the suppression of insurrection and rebellion. They were aware that the grant of these powers implied all other powers necessary to give them full effect.

The only case that I have heard cited during this debate that seemed to support at all the contention of those who say that we have not the constitutional right to pass the pending bill is Ex parte Milligan, Fourth Wallace, page 2; but in that case, although personal guaranties under the Constitution were upheld in time of war, the President had acted contrary to the provisions of the Constitution, without power conferred by Congress, in a section where war did not exist, where martial law had not been declared, and where the courts were open to enforce the law. The case has no application here; that is, it was a mere action by the President not supported by powers expressly granted by Congress. We are now engaged in passing laws which will expressly authorize the President to do these most necessary things.

So much I have felt moved to say in order to reassure those of my friends who have had no time to examine the authorities as to the war powers of Congress. There is ample power for everything the President has asked us to enact and for everything he is likely to ask us to enact; and Senators who will approach the subject with an open mind can fully satisfy themselves by consulting any standard textbook on the United States Constitution.

There is absolutely no mystery about this. It does not take a so-called constitutional lawyer to understand it, or even to expound it. No one has made out a good case yet for any constitutional provision which this measure, as reported by the committee, will violate. The amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] evidently does contravene that amendment to the Constitution which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation; but I am quite sure that an amendment to the bill will be offered that will take care of that part of the defect.

There are extraordinary constitutional provisions which apply expressly in war times. These, of course, must be regarded at all hazards, and they doubtless will be. But when a conflict arises between any ordinary provision of the Constitution and any necessary and reasonable war measure—Congress to be the judge of the necessity and reasonableness—that particular provision of the Constitution will give way. It always has been so and it always will be so. Let there be no mistake about that.

The Constitution has never yet stood in the way of the enactment of a necessary and reasonable war measure. Such was not the intention of our forefathers. They knew too well the dangers to be apprehended from any lack of power to mobilize the men and the resources of the country for its adequate protection. The present crisis vindicates their judgment. The safety of the Nation stands first in the land of the free.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The case that the Senator has cited, from Seventh Howard, I believe, arising in Rhode Island, was a case where martial law had been declared. May I ask the Senator whether Congress has any broader power under the Constitution where martial law has been declared than where war has been declared without the declaration of martial law? In other words, has not the Congress of the United States just as much power under the Constitution in a time like this, where war has been declared with a foreign power, as it had in Rhode Island, where martial law had been declared?

Mr. HOLLIS. The point raised by the Senator from Oregon illustrates the matter very nicely, and I am very glad to give my view upon it.

The inhibition against invading the castle of a citizen and taking him out by force without a warrant is one that was intended for his private protection, and one that must not and should not be invaded unless there is actual war at the place where the man lives, or unless martial law has been declared at that place and the courts are closed for the ordinary redress of wrongs. Now, I find no warrant—at least, I find no expediency—that would lead me to favor the passage at this time of any law which would override any express provision of the Constitution, whether it was intended to protect a citizen in time of war or in time of peace. I would therefore regard the provisions of the Constitution so far as they are express and so far as they fairly can be regarded without weakening the power to make war. I would give to every citizen whose property we take full compensation for any property that we take. I would take it only under due process of law. I would not interfere by direct action with any contract existing, but so far as it is necessary to pass special and extraordinary laws like the pending measure, and so far as those laws may incidentally and collaterally interfere with existing contracts, I am very clear as to our right to pass them; but I do not believe that even in war time, serious as the war is, we have a right to take the private property of a citizen and use it for a public use without giving him just compensation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, and in partial reply to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator will recall that in the passage of the espionage bill that question was considered; and believing the Constitution to be controlling and with a due regard to constitutional inhibitions, it was there carefully provided that there should be no search or seizure until the forms that were known to the common law were complied with. Of course, at common law there could be search and seizure, but there were certain acts of procedure that had to be complied with; and in the espionage bill we were careful to protect the rights of the citizens against unlawful search and to conform that law to the procedure that was recognized as proper at common law.

Mr. HOLLIS. I thank the Senator. That is doubtless so. There is but one provision contained in any law which we have yet passed in the Senate at this session which does run contrary to any provision of the Constitution. That is the provision that I have already referred to, in the bill for priority of shipments on railroads; and that was inserted in the bill on the insistence of those who oppose this measure on the ground that it is unconstitutional. That is the measure which does not provide adequate compensation to the railroads for taking from them their property, to-wit, their right to carry profitable freight when it is offered, in preference to unprofitable freight.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I deem it to be my duty to state the reasons why I shall not be able to vote for this bill if it comes before the Senate in its present form.

Mr. President, we are all agreed that we must do everything to win this war. I do not consider that a debatable question. The question which confronts us when legislation comes before us at this critical time is whether that legislation is in the direction of winning the war or of losing it, and to that question we are bound to bring our very best judgment; for the responsibility for legislation rests upon us, and upon us alone.

On previous occasions I have urged the imperative necessity for constructive legislation looking to a large increase of the food supply of this and of the allied nations. The last food bill which was passed by the Senate more than a month ago, the consideration of which by a conference committee has been inexcusably delayed, while totally inadequate to meet the situation, had within it important constructive elements, while the pending bill is wholly destructive in its nature, and destructive in many different directions. I believe, if enacted, it will be, first of all, destructive of that spirit of toleration, conciliation, and cooperation which is the first essential for the unification of the Nation; it will be destructive of that confidence and patriotic individual initiative which are absolutely necessary to enable our industries, trade, and commerce to move at such high speed as will give them the stability to bear without wavering the heavy financial burdens of this war. It is apparently designedly destructive of the complicated marketing, storage, and distributive organs and functions of the Nation. It is legislation which will be destructive of the vast productive activities of the country, being, when all is said, if we may accept the statements of its defenders, such pernicious class legislation, conceived almost wholly in the interest of the consumer, as will inevitably most seriously reduce the acreage to be seeded in crops, curtail all of our agricultural operations, and thus prove to be the offering of stone for bread to those now suffering in our cities because of the high price of foodstuffs.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am convinced that if we enact this bill into law we strike an all but mortal blow into the very vitals of this Nation as she is rising and slowly gathering strength to gird herself for what must be a dangerous, if not a deadly combat; and, Mr. President, the responsibility for the incalculable injury which may be done by this ill-considered and unsound legislation can not be shifted by any subtile processes of reasoning from our shoulders to those of another.

Mr. President, we all know that war is the supreme test of the integrity of the social structure. At best it is always a frightful strain and drain upon the national vitality; and for this very reason, in time of war, legislative action should be temperate, not drastic. Legislation should be conservative, not radical; regulative, not restrictive; stimulative, not depressive of the necessary, normal functions of the national life.

The establishment of a state of war does not suspend the operation of fundamental physical and economic laws. These natural laws are as eternal and as inexorable as the everlasting Reason of which they are the expression. They change not with the fashion of the times, nor can they be altered in an hour to avert the exigencies and emergencies which are the logical consequencies of past follies.

Reliable and ascertainable, they may be invoked by intelligence to the achievement of definite and beneficent ends, but they may not with impunity be ignored. A failure of our action or legislation to conform to them must necessarily be followed by diminished vitality and capacity. Disaster follows upon their disobedience, and in the great post mortem laboratory of history we find that there is a pathology of States as well as of men, a science with laws which may be interpreted and understood, a due observance of which will always insure scientific and successful legislative action. The same laws of evolution, integration, and differentiation develop in the individual and in the social body multiple, complex and mutually interacting organs and functions, and create delicate controlling and regulating mechanisms which constantly operate to maintain a proper balance between the various different, and in some cases antagonistic, forces in the organic whole. Any or all of these functions may become disordered, the abnormal condition being revealed by definite symptoms which make possible an accurate diagnosis. Prolonged, persistent, and constantly advancing food prices are no evidence whatever of a failure of the price regulating and distributive mechanisms, but furnish rather almost certain proof of a more fundamental and serious maladjustment or malady demanding painstaking investigation in order that a proper remedy may be applied.

So alarming in its import is this constantly advancing price for food that a remedy is always imperatively necessary. It calls for prompt and vigorous action, but it must be action founded upon exact and scientific information. For this difficulty no remedy can be too radical if it is rational, but at such a critical time a radical remedy, such as this bill, which is not rational, may well prove fatal. There is not the slightest evidence which has been adduced by the supporters of this bill, except bare and unsupported assertion, that speculation and manipulation disordering the price-regulating mechanism, have been the controlling factors in advancing the price of food, while there are abundant proofs, historic, based upon the experience of nations in the past, cumulative proofs plainly evident on every hand to those who have been interested in the food supply and agricultural problems of this country during recent years, and expert testimony, all of which make inevitable the conclusion that the advance in the price of foodstuffs during recent years, particularly during the last decade, has been due to a failure of productive capacity to keep pace with the consumptive demand, and it is self-evident that the remedy for this condition is not the lowering of price by arbitrary fixation by law, but a stimulation of production, not only as the normal result of the advancing price, but by careful and judicious legislative action founded upon a clear understanding of the difficulties and risks which must now be met by those engaged in agricultural production. Under the operation of natural law the best cure for high prices, under ordinary conditions, is the high price, for this tends to bring the radical, if belated, cure of abundant production.

Mr. President, all this is so obvious that it should not need restatement, and yet the experience of the past furnishes abundant evidence that when there arises a serious shortage of food, with consequent large advances in price, the indirect but rational remedy of stimulating food production is always neglected for the apparently simpler but utterly unscientific symptomatic treatment by price fixation, a remedy which always aggravates the dangerous evil which it seeks to cure. The attempt to lower prices by statutory decree is one of the most ancient of all human legislative follies. It is a well beloved and all but universally praised panacea. Nearly four and a half centuries before the Christian era, when agriculture had declined in Greece until more than one-half her grain came from foreign shores, there were frequent shortages in the grain supply, and the Athenian statesmen established regulations to prevent the cornering of markets and unreasonable profits to the dealers, and there has been preserved the simple and beautiful Greek of the Athenian orator Lysias, who conducted the trial of those dealers who apparently had violated the law, with which he hurls accusations against them in language which has a sound quite modern. He said:

> For when you happen to be most in want of grain they grab it and are unwilling to sell, and you may be well satisfied to buy from them at any price whatever and take your leave of them, so that sometimes when there is peace we are reduced to a state of siege by them. (Hellenic Civilization, Botsford & Sihler, p. 429.)

Lest any be consumed with a pride of authorship of this bill, I would say that it has a very ancient prototype, for in the year 303 A. D., when the Roman Empire was declining rapidly to its destruction; when the farmers, unable longer to endure their hardships, were deserting their fields, drawn by the allurements and feverish excitements to join the thronging and disorderly crowds in Rome, which were demanding largesses of grain without labor; when, because of the neglect of agriculture, the cost of food had risen enormously, Diocletian, in response to a popular clamor, decided to reduce the cost of living by an imperial decree.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senator if he does not think there ought to be one on the majority side in the Chamber?

Mr. GORE. I answer "present."

Mr. FRANCE. I know it is very late. I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota. I presume he does not wish to take me off my feet.

Mr. GORE. I wish to express regret that all Senators are not here.

Mr. FRANCE. I will ask to have a part of this decree, which seems to me to be very little known, inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator state what decree it is?

Mr. FRANCE. It is the decree which was issued in the year A. D. 303 by the Emperor Diocletian.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I trust the Senator will continue his address. It is most interesting and illuminating.

Mr. FRANCE. This decree sounds very much like the arguments advanced by some of the Senators who are defenders of this bill. Perhaps it would be as well to have it go into the RECORD, to show that, after all, these arguments are not original.

Diocletian says:

> For if the raging avarice * * * which, without regard for mankind, increases and develops by leaps and bounds, we will not say from year to year, month to month, or day to day, but almost from hour to hour, and even from minute to minute, could be held in check by some regard for moderation, or if the welfare of the people could calmly tolerate this mad license from which, in a situation like this, it suffers in the worst possible fashion from day to day, some ground would appear, perhaps, for concealing the truth and saying nothing; * * * but inasmuch as there is only seen a mad desire, without control, to pay no heed to the needs of the many * * * it seems good to us, as we look into the future, to us who are the fathers of the people, that justice intervene to settle matters impartially, in order that that which, long-hoped for, humanity itself could not bring about may be secured for the common government of all by the remedies which our care affords. * * * Who is of so hardened a heart and so untouched by a feeling for humanity that he can be unaware—nay, that he has not noticed—that in the sale of wares which are exchanged in the market or dealt with in the daily business of the cities an exorbitant tendency in prices has spread to such an extent that the unbridled desire of plundering is held in check neither by abundance nor by seasons of plenty!
> It is our pleasure, therefore, that those prices which the subjoined written summary specifies be held in observance throughout all our domain, that all may know that license to go above the same has been cut off. * * * It is our pleasure (also) that if any man shall boldly come into conflict with this formal statute, he shall put his life in peril. * * * In the same peril also shall he be placed who, drawn along by avarice in his desire to buy, shall have conspired against these statutes. Nor shall he be esteemed innocent of the same crime who, having articles necessary for daily life and use, shall have decided hereafter that they can be held back, since the punishment ought to be even heavier for him who causes need than for him who violates the laws.

Appended to that decree was a long list of articles with the prices stated, a very interesting commentary upon the life of the times. The price of every article and of labor was fixed. I have just noted a few of them here:

Thirty-five cubits, eighty digits square		12,000

And so forth.

I do not care to burden the RECORD with these items. Anyone wishing to read them at length can do so by looking up the text of the decree.

The list of articles, of which only a small portion has been read, bears convincing testimony to the fact that Diocletian recognized the stern logic of the situation which required that if prices were to be fixed upon some articles they must be fixed upon all, he even including labor itself, upon which logical conclusion the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has several times insisted.

Of course, Mr. President, disaster followed this decree, as it must ever follow all vain human efforts to nullify the laws of nature. Lactantius (A. D. 260–340) makes an illuminating comment upon the results. Speaking of Diocletian and this famous edict he says:

> And when he had brought on a state of exceeding high prices by his different acts of injustice, he tried to fix by law the prices of articles offered for sale. Thereupon, for the veriest trifles, much blood was shed, and out of fear nothing was offered for sale, and the scarcity grew much worse, until, after the death of many persons, the law was repealed from mere necessity. (The Common People of Ancient Rome, Abbott, 177.)

More than a thousand years later in England the same futile attempt was made to so regulate the prices of products that benefits would accrue to the consumer, and in our own country in 1777, when an inflated currency had resulted in a burdensome advance in prices, Congress passed laws "to prevent the present fluctuating and exhorbitant prices," concerning which legislation Adams wrote:

> The attempt of New England to regulate prices is extremely popular in Congress, but for my own part I expect only a partial and temporary relief from it, and I fear that after a time the evils will break forth with greater violence. The matter will flow with greater rapidity for having been damned up for a time. (Financial History of the United States, Bolles, p. 159.)

The truth of this opinion was quickly demonstrated by the subsequent events.

The farseeing statesmen of that day maintained that "trade should be left to regulate itself." A writer in the Connecticut Courant made a statement, which, in my opinion, is as true today as it then was:

> As to the scheme of supporting the money and regulating the prices of things by penal statutes, it always has and ever will be impracticable in a free country, because no law can be framed to limit a man in the purchase or disposal of property, but what must infringe those principles of liberty for which we are gloriously fighting. (May 12, 1777, Financial History of the United States, Bolles, p. 161.)

Many other instances might be cited to prove the futility of all such undertakings. In a most interesting discussion of the causes of the fearful famine of 1770 in Bengal, John Fiske, for instance, clearly points out that bungling legislation interfering with the normal rise in price had much to do with the causation of that terrible tragedy. Speaking of this and of another disastrous attempt to enforce low prices he makes the following statement and quotation:

> The enforced lowness of prices prevented any general retrenchment on the part of the citizens. Nobody felt it necessary to economize. Everyone bought as much bread and ate it as freely as if the Government—

And here is a very significant sentence and it is the whole argument against this bill—> as if the Government by insuring its cheapness had insured its abundance.

I wish every Senator would carefully consider that—> as if the Government by insuring its cheapness had insured its abundance. So the city lived in high spirits until all at once provisions gave out, and the Government had to step in again to palliate the distress which it had wrought.

Again:

> By interdicting what it was pleased to term the monopoly of grain—

This is with reference to the Bengal famine—

> By interdicting what it was pleased to term the monopoly of grain, it prevented prices from rising at once to their natural rates. The Province had a certain amount of food in it, and this food had to last about nine months. Private enterprise, if left to itself, would have stored up the general supply at the harvest with a view to realizing a larger profit at a later period in the scarcity. Prices would in consequence have immediately risen, compelling the population to reduce their consumption from the very beginning of the dearth.

I am not, of course, contending that high prices are desirable, nor am I expressing an opposition which I do not feel to proper and necessary legislation, such as that which has already been passed by the Senate against illegitimate manipulations of food prices, but I am endeavoring, with that brevity which is always dangerous in the discussion of so large a question, to indicate that by historic fact and by a consideration of economic law we are informed that price fixation by legislative action must be followed by an aggravation of that deplorable social condition which is inevitably created by inadequate food production.

It is now imperative that we should realize that the recent acutely advancing prices are but further warnings of the presence of that portentous world problem which has been created by this war—the problem of how much longer increasing numbers of mankind can be drafted from the productive pursuits of peace into the destructive wastage of war without the causation of a world condition which will be a menace to the stability of all government, the conservation of civilization and the preservation of the most cherished possessions of the race.

Before our declaration of war this country was the only large remaining reservoir of surplus labor, commodities, and food upon which the allied nations could draw to meet their desperate need. Our entrance into the war involved an immediate decrease in our productive power and an increase in our consumption demand, since large numbers must be called for military service and increased stocks of munitions and supplies must be required. In view of this new condition, if we do not proceed with extreme caution, adopting scientific methods for the perfection of an organization for the utilization of every unit of residue man power and the most efficient adjustment and application of such power to all of the manifold activities which combine to make up the huge task of conducting modern warfare, it may well happen that the whole defensive and offensive operations of the allied armies will break down from the loss of proper support and the lack of sufficient supplies. Lloyd George in urging upon England the necessity for greater food production said:

> The line which the British Empire holds against the Germans is held at home as well as abroad; if it breaks anywhere, it breaks everywhere.

Each day's events furnish additional evidence of the imperative need for immediate constructive legislation looking to such a national organization as will enable us to wage this war without that harassing and hampering of our instrumentalities of production, which must result in distress and perhaps disorder at home and discomfiture and possibly disaster abroad. It is for this reason that I find myself compelled to oppose this legislation, which, in my judgment, tends to a disorganization, if not to a demoralization, of all productive enterprise, particularly of the fundamentally vital, complex processes of food production. Now as never before must we give consideration to those great problems which the farmer has for so long been facing. For some years the farmer has been confronted by most discouraging conditions; by unprecedented prices for all he must purchase, by an almost prohibitive wage scale for farm labor, by an utter inability at times to secure adequate assistance, by a declining soil fertility, and now he is facing a threatened destruction of the market in which he must sell, while he is reading each day in the city papers exaggerated statements and promises made to the consumers in the cities to the effect that this so-called food-control bill will greatly reduce the price of food, a price reduction which the farmer knows inevitably involves a lower price for those crops which he is now producing with a very narrow margin of profit, if not, indeed, at a loss. In addition, he is now informed that agricultural workers will not be exempted from the operation of the selective draft, contrary to the implication of the language of the military bill, and this means that he is now to be deprived perhaps of his son or of some of the indispensable help which, against great odds, he has thus far been able to retain upon the farm. I am convinced that the passage of this pending measure and the drafting of a large part of the new army from the agricultural workers of the land will result in the abandonment of thousands of acres, which under a more carefully thought out and scientifically executed plan would be seeded to winter wheat.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FRANCE. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. To substantiate what the Senator from Maryland has said, I want to call his attention to the fact that in my State wages have already increased to the common laborer from $2 a day to $4 a day.

Mr. FRANCE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. And if the Senator will pardon me further, I will say that I am somewhat familiar with the history to which he has referred and also with the Diocletian edict. I think in that edict there were included all kinds of cereals, wine, oil, meat, vegetables, fruits, skins, leather, furs, footgear, timber, carpets, all kinds of articles of dress, and also the wages of the common laborer and of the professional advocate.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator from North Dakota is correct.

Mr. GRONNA. But is it not possible that, because beer and wine have been left out of this bill, we might save the farmer in that way?

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator's suggestion is a very interesting one. Personally, I view this food problem as a great national problem, which can not be met successfully by any one single act of legislation. I am very glad that the Senator from North Dakota has interrupted me.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator that I am not taking this position light-heartedly at all. I agree with what the Senator has said.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator from North Dakota is one of the men who knows this subject, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] knows it, and, as I believe, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] knows it, although I am not so familiar with his particular views. I am very glad the Senator from North Dakota has interrupted me, because I always dislike to discuss generalities. I, of course, can not, without taking too much time, go into this great subject of the declining agriculture of the United States, and the declining profits, and the comparatively meager earnings of the farmer; but I shall give one or two facts which are noteworthy in this connection.

If there are any Senators here in favor of this bill, they might do well to consider over Sunday these facts, which the more one thinks about them the more startling and alarming they appear—facts which are not enough considered; facts that can not be fully appreciated by men who are not experts in the Agricultural Department of the United States—those men who have been wrestling with the problems which underlie the problem of the high cost of living, which we say is a war problem, but which was becoming more and more a menacing problem before this war broke out.

The statement is frequently made that the cost of production and the wages paid out by the farmer have declined because of the increased use of agricultural machinery. I want you to take these facts and see if you think they have anything to do with the high cost of living and the present serious situation in which we find ourselves.

I shall not burden you with a mass of statistics. I shall only give you a skeleton toward which you may direct your thoughts, but the more you think upon this skeleton the more it must appear to be a haunting ghost of evil portent. Let me give you concisely these facts. In 1899 the American farmer paid out in wages $357,392,000; in 1909 he paid out in wages for his labor $651,611,000, an increase in his labor cost of 82.3 per cent. In 1899 he paid out in fertilizer about $53,500,000, while in 1909 he paid out nearly $115,000,000, an increase of 115 per cent. Bearing in mind these facts, it is most significant that in 1899 the cereal crop amounted to 4,438,857,013 bushels, while in 1909 the cereal crops amounted to 4,512,564,465 bushels, an increase in the number of bushels of only 1.7 per cent. That additional cost of labor and that additional cost of fertilizer, 82.3 per cent for labor and 115 per cent increase for fertilizer, brought only 1.7 per cent increase in the yield of cereals of the country. Of what a serious situation these figures tell to any man who really has at heart the interest of the American farmer and of the American Nation, for they are inseparable. I might produce more figures to show at what great cost was secured the 1.7 per cent increase of the crop of grain.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator mean in the price of grain?

Mr. FRANCE. No. In its quantity. There is another point I might discuss—the money value of the crop of cereals increased; the statistics of the Department of Agriculture show that the money value of the cereal crops advanced very greatly in percentage, a very significant fact in considering the cost-of-living problem. Now, while the cereal crops only increased during that period 1.7 per cent, the general population of the country increased 21 per cent—the urban population increasing 34.8 per cent while the rural population increased only 11.2 per cent. These figures, upon the relative percentage increases of the urban and rural population, are most significant, as they clearly indicate two things—first, the steady flow of population from the rural to the urban districts due to the relative unprofitableness of farming, in a large measure, and, second, the much greater relative increase of consumers over producers.

Mr. GRONNA. Will it bother the Senator from Maryland if I again interrupt him?

Mr. FRANCE. Not at all.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, the $350,000,000 paid out by the farmers for labor is only what we call additional labor. If the Senator will permit me to make the statement in his remarks, I desire to say that there are in this country about 7,000,000 farmers, who, with their wives and their children, work without receiving any wages.

Mr. FRANCE. Very true.

Mr. GRONNA. They get only their food and their clothing.

Mr. FRANCE. Very true.

Mr. GRONNA. And the 82.3 per cent—$350,000,000—of increase in wages paid, which the Senator from Maryland has mentioned, is simply for additional labor, which the farmers themselves and their families can not perform. If the farmer's industry had not been such as it is, the farmer and his family generally performing the labor upon the farm, does not the Senator think that the increase in the cost of cereals would have been a great deal more than it is to-day?

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly. The Senator from North Dakota is correct. I might amplify his statement. If it had not been for the fact that, owing to inadequate remuneration, the farmers of the United States have been living on the stored-up fertility in the soil, the cost of grains in Europe and all over the world would have long before this reached unprecedented prices. I am not speaking of $2 a bushel for wheat; I am speaking of vastly higher, almost prohibitive, prices for wheat; I am saying that but for the fact that out of the stored-up fertility of the American soil we have been for years shipping grain to Europe at a price far below what it could be produced for under any permanent system of agriculture, famine would have long ago, in all probability, overtaken some of the very nations which are now engaged in war.

These few facts and figures, which have occurred to me, surely have some bearing upon the problem of the food supply and food prices. How is the food administrator, to be created under the proposed legislation, to cure this condition, caused by a national neglect and inefficiency, a condition which, let me say, has been brought about in part by repeated acts of legislation, National and State, which have been contrary to the interests of American agriculture and much of which legislation, I regret to say, was passed with a promise to the farmers that it was being enacted for their benefit?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that the Senator from Maryland is an authority on dietetics, and I should like to ask him if it is not true that wheat or wheat bread is the cheapest food to-day, perhaps with the exception of milk, and would it not be a detriment to the American consumers, to the poor people, to put them upon a diet and deny them bread? Is it not better to stimulate production and make it possible for the poor people of America to be able to get wheat and wheat bread, even at advanced prices?

Mr. FRANCE. That is certainly true.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the American people ought to know that. They have been told not to eat bread.

Mr. FRANCE. I think it might be a good thing to have wheat sell at from $3 to $4 a bushel between now and next October. It would be a blessing to the people of the American cities——

Mr. REED. I will ask the Senator to tell why?

Mr. FRANCE. Simply because such price would probably result in the seeding of an enormous acreage in wheat; and if the farmer is sure of a good price for his wheat a 2,000,000,000 bushel wheat crop is easily within the capacity of our farming operations. The seeding of such an enormous acreage in wheat this autumn would go far toward preventing advancing prices for wheat during this coming winter; indeed, nothing can act as powerfully to depress grain prices as prospects for a phenomenal crop. For this reason a temporary high price acting over a short period in the late summer tends to bring a low price over a longer period later on.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question there?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield first to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator referred to legislation, both State and National, which he deplored as being detrimental to the interests of the farmer and the country generally. Will the Senator be a little more specific in regard to that and state the kind of legislation, or the particular legislation which he has in mind?

Mr. REED. Before the Senator goes to that I hope he will permit me to ask him to complete the statement he was just making, because the statement that $3 or $4 wheat would be a blessing to this country, stated alone and sent to the country, would, I am sure, not do the Senator's real views justice. I take it that the Senator does not want a high price for wheat for the sake of the high price.

Mr. FRANCE. No; certainly not.

Mr. REED. But for the sake of stimulating production; and the Senator has stated that the guaranty of such a price for wheat as $3 might mean a 2,000,000,000-bushel crop next year. If we had a 2,000,000,000-bushel crop of wheat, what would be the effect on prices then?

Mr. FRANCE. A very great decline in the price, undoubtedly, from the price which I have mentioned. The mere prospect of such a crop would tend to keep the price down during all the months following the seeding.

Mr. REED. So that when the Senator speaks of guaranteeing a high price for wheat, it is with a view to a large production and ultimately a lower price?

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I thought that it ought to be made plain, because otherwise the statement of the Senator might be misunderstood.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator that I probably somewhat overstated the price necessary to stimulate production. I do not think, as I was about to say, that $3 wheat is necessary to insure an enormous crop—and I will come to that later—but I say that if it had happened that the law of supply and demand had created a high price—and I am not speaking of competitive buying between the various countries, because there are, I recognize, special conditions which exist now—but if the normal action of the price mechanism had raised wheat to $2.50 a bushel, it would have meant a decline in the consumption of wheat this summer, when there is an abundance of food of various kinds to supplement the diet of bread, and, of course, would have resulted, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, who has very ably discussed, and in a most scholarly manner, this whole question, in very decided stimulation of production.

Now, in answer to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], I will say that I may perhaps take up at some later time this question of legislation, may I say, of a "gold-brick" character? I need not go very far from this bill, because this bill itself promises cheap bread and high wheat prices.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FRANCE. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to give just one illustration, in answer to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. When the farmer in 1912, according to the report of the Department of Agriculture, earned, net, 20 cents a day for himself and the adult members of his family, with which they were to purchase their clothing and pay doctors' bills, the Congress of the United States, by a very decisive vote, raised by 25 per cent the wages of men who were receiving from $5 to $6 a day upon our railroads, to be paid sooner or later by the farmer and his family who were earning 20 cents a day. That is one instance; and there are a great many others, if the Senator wants them.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I have already trespassed upon the time of the Senate far longer than I had expected; but I feel that the Senators who vote against this bill are entitled to have their explanations heard. I intended to make my explanation as brief as possible, and I regret that it has been prolonged; but I must venture to put into the RECORD a quotation from what I consider to be a very able article upon this general subject of price fixation. It comes from Minnesota, by the way, which State seems to produce clear thinkers. The quotation is from Mr. Allen Albert, of Minneapolis, who, in 1912, read a most interesting paper at a meeting of the Minnesota Academy of Social Sciences, held at the University of Minnesota.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. Before the Senator begins reading the quotation, referring to his allusion to this bill as "gold-brick" legislation, and the promise of cheap bread and high wheat, I think the epithet is very appropriate; and I wish to say to him and to the Senate that I was talking with a settlement worker this morning, who told me that Mr Hoover was sending word, and that ladies wearing jewels were advising people of the East Side of New York, to eat less bread and not to eat four meals a day. She stated that they were eating less bread; that they would be rejoiced to get even three meals a day; that they were on the verge, if not of starvation at least of hunger; and that they were looking to the passage of this bill for the alleviation of their wants and to drive the wolf from their door.

Mr. FRANCE. It is a very pathetic situation, without any exaggeration. I shudder to think what will be the condition in our cities a year from next fall if we pass legislation—and there is room for difference of opinion as to whether this is such legislation, but I believe it is, and I can not vote for it—if we pass legislation which will do one single thing to discourage the producer of crops upon the American farm. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for his observation.

The article to which I have referred was entitled "How far is State regulation of prices desirable?" and I quote from it because it is such a clear, concise statement; indeed, it is such a statement as I can fully indorse now, although the author was discussing another aspect of the question and might not thank me for using his words in connection with this bill, because he might not be opposed to this bill, but I am adopting his language simply because it expresses in a very concise form a number of objections which I have to this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator goes to that will he allow me to interrupt him once more?

Mr. FRANCE. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to know what the poor people who are starving to death on the east side of New York are now receiving in wages? My colleague has just said that we are suffering for the want of labor at $4 a day out on the farms. The Senator from New York stated the other day that the savings deposits were greater among that class of people than ever before. If the attempt were made to hire one of them, I want to ask if any of them could be hired for less than $3 a day, and whether people need to be in a starving condition when the lowest wages run from $3 up to $6 and $8 a day?

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that it would be impossible to get these people to go to the country to work on the farms at any reasonable wage.

Mr. GORE. And they would not be of much value if they went there.

Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Maryland, I wish to say in that connection that Dr. King, in the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture, gave a most interesting and illuminating statement upon that point, at least so far as the city of Philadelphia is concerned. He showed the great advance in the cost of living as compared with the very slight advance in wages. Wages do not respond to the rapid increase in prices. I am sure the Senator would be interested to see the statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply asked what the wages were. Am I correct in stating that the average wage is now about $3 a day for the very lowest character of labor?

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator that he has made a very good point, and one which I might speak upon at some length, but I will merely say this: The effect of all legislation passed chiefly in the interest of the consumer—class legislation—is always pernicious in its results, being contrary to the eternal law. That is proven by the fact that during a period of years we have been passing legislation—much of it in itself desirable, some of it to raise wages, some of it to shorten hours, some of it to improve working and living conditions—the whole tenor of it being to raise wages, but the real wage of the city worker, in spite of all this, because production has been falling off, has been declining. In other words, there are two wages—and I need not say this to the learned Senators—the real wage and the nominal wage.

It makes no difference what the nominal wage is; it may be $10 a day; but if the cost of what the man has to buy is proportionately higher, the wage of $10 a day may be lower than the wage of a dollar a day under the opposite condition. Now, as a matter of fact, in spite of all of our remedial legislation—and this accounts for some of the distress in the cities—although there is a large nominal wage, the cost of living has been outstripping the wage, so that the nominal wage, while it has been higher, does not represent the true condition. I have here tables, such as those compiled by Prof. Rubinow and others, on this very point. I will just note the results in 1912. The full time for the weekly employee was compensated for on a percentage basis of 131.6, while the retail price of food had advanced to 154.2.

Mr. McCUMBER. That includes clerkships, etc., as well as laborers?

Mr. FRANCE. Oh, yes; the Senator is perfectly correct; I am not combatting the Senator, because his position is perfectly sound.

Mr. McCUMBER. The labor has gone up, while the clerkships and things of that kind have remained stationary; and that is the cause of the difference between the rise in earning capacities and the rise in the cost of things we must eat and wear.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FRANCE. I do.

Mr. REED. I think, in the interest of accuracy, another fact ought to be stated at this point. While it is true that wages have advanced, and they have advanced very greatly in some occupations, yet I think it is also true that they have not advanced as rapidly, perhaps, as the cost of living has advanced in some places; and I think you must put emphasis upon the words "some places." But while that is true, there is another factor which must be considered if we want to get at a correct understanding of the situation; and that is that whereas in 1914 and for many years prior to that time there had been a large percentage of our population anxious and willing to work who were without employment, to-day it may be said, for all practical purposes, that no man capable of working and willing to work is without employment. I recall examining figures last fall—frankly, I examined them for the purpose of using them in a campaign document—and I found that at that time, something like a year ago now, there were employed in the United States between three and four million more wage earners than there were in the year 1912.

So that when it is said that wages have not advanced per diem and to the individual in proportion to the cost of living, you must remember also that there is a very much better employment of labor, and that helps equalize matters to a very large extent. I am not prepared to say that wages ought not to advance further, at least in certain lines; but I think the fact I have stated ought to go in the RECORD.

Mr. FRANCE. It is a very important fact, which should be borne in mind, and I thank the Senator for introducing it. I might say to the Senator, however, that, unfortunately—and I shall not go into that subject again, because I have taken the time of the Senate far beyond what I had expected, almost an hour of the Senate's time on a previous occasion, to discuss that very subject—unfortunately, we have absolutely no knowledge as to the percentage of unemployment in this country at the present time. We may have one, two, three, four, or five million men who are not working.

Now, I agree with the Senator that the assumption is a reasonable one that few ought to be out of work at such a time; but we have a very large country with a diversified population, the citizens of which live under very different conditions. Some are unwilling to work; some have no occupation; some want to work and can not find work. I know men of that character, and so does the Senator, I am sure, in our cities—misfits, so to speak, who can not find a suitable situation. I do not think we can afford not to know at this time what our surplus of unutilized labor is, and I do earnestly commend to the Senate a consideration again of the enrollment by occupations which I suggested some time since to find out what our man power is and how much of a surplus is available in the present emergency, because we need it all.

I do not subscribe to the theory that the man power of Germany is exhausted. The man power of Germany is preparing to go into the trenches; but any man who knows the capacity of the German women for work will find small comfort in the thought that the man power is exhausted, because the women of Germany must now be largely carrying on the enterprises of that country.

Mr. McCUMBER. And 2,000,000 Russian prisoners.

Mr. FRANCE. And 2,000,000 Russian prisoners, as the Senator has suggested. We can not afford guesswork now. I should like to see an amendment added to this bill, if it is to pass, to provide a plan by which we can know whether there are available men to be put upon the farms. We can not fight this war against so powerful a foe while merely speculating upon such a serious problem.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, how does the Senator propose to put them on the farm?

Mr. FRANCE. I know that touches a point which is a very tender one with the Senator, because I have listened with very great interest to all of his remarks to which I have been able to listen with the frequent interruptions which have called me away. I will suggest, in answer to that question, that we now have a selective-draft law, and if the Senator thinks it is any more equitable and just to draft a man to go to the trenches of Europe than to draft him to go to the farm, then let the farm boys stay on the farm and draft in their places additional unemployed men who may be now in the cities. Many men, let me say, are idle in our cities, ordinarily, who are not guilty of any crime in not being at work. I think I am not going too far in my sympathy for human nature when I say that almost every man who is not working productively, who is a loafer, an idler, or a "bum," is so because he has not found his work. Draft those men who are not employed from the cities and let the farm boys stay on the farms. This is an indirect method of avoiding the difficulty which arises in the mind of the Senator from Missouri, and a difficulty which I must admit is a very grave one.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would let me say this: I did not interrupt him in any controversial manner. I think there is a great deal of wisdom in his suggestion of a survey of unemployment or of employment. I do not know whether that term exactly covers the Senator's idea or not, for unfortunately I could not be here during that entire address.

Mr. FRANCE. I called it a complete enrollment.

Mr. REED. I think, however, the Senator will find that while there is no accurate information, there is a very considerable fund of information in the Department of Labor, and I should be very glad to support an amendment to this bill, if the Senator offers it, which will provide for an ascertainment of the facts with reference to nonemployment. That at least would give us a place to start.

Mr. FRANCE. I think it would be very wise to have such legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. May I suggest to the Senator that if the farm laborers were entirely exempted and all kept on the farm—and I concede that it would be a good thing as far as production is concerned; I am not making this suggestion in any fault-finding spirit—but if that were done, as he has suggested, and the idle man in the city and the bum in the city were drafted into the Army to do the fighting, would it not follow that our Army would be rather inefficient? Would it not interfere with its efficiency to quite an extent? If we had an Army composed of men of that kind, while we would have lots of good men in it, undoubtedly a large number of these men who would not be fit to work on the farm would be unfitted to make good soldiers.

Mr. FRANCE. I recognize the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. REED. Let me answer the Senator from Nebraska, if I may.

Mr. FRANCE. Yes; I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. REED. I think, since we are having this little talk, it would not necessarily follow that you would have for the Army a man who is at present unemployed. You would get the young, strong, and active man who is at present in a job; and, having taken him, it would make a place for somebody who was out of a job to step in. However, I do not by this mean to say that I am in favor of the Senator's plan not to draft anybody from the country. My own opinion is that if you did not take some of them you would lose a large part of the best fighting strength you would have.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. FRANCE. That is true. The only thing is that a survey of the food situation shows that we need that fighting strength out on the land.

Mr. REED. That is true.

Mr. FRANCE. And, let me tell you, it takes a good man, physically and mentally, to make a good farmer. A man must be sound to the core to be a good farmer; and such men are always in great demand, in peace or in war.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention, with his permission, to the fact that we have in this country a large army of men who do not want to work at all. Our experience in Minnesota is that these I. W. W.'s do not want to work at all, either on the farm or in the mines or anywhere else, and they do not want to register. They did not register. We have to-day in the jail of Duluth over 300 of those men that did not register—I. W. W.'s. They would not work either in the woods, in the mines, or on the farms. Now, what will you do with men of that kind? And if the Senator will allow me further, any census of the unemployed ought to give an account of those men who could get work and will not work.

Mr. FRANCE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say that there is no occasion for men to be unemployed now if they have any nerve and any patriotic blood in them. If they can not get work in a large city they can enlist in the Army and get $30 a month and their board and clothing, equal to $50 a month, and then be made into real manhood.

Mr. FRANCE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. There is no better school in which to educate young men than in the Army.

Mr. FRANCE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. The best education I got was the three and a half years I served as an enlisted man, a private, and a non-commissioned officer, in the Regular Army; and if I had my life to live over again, I would like to go through just that course of education.

Mr. FRANCE. We all know that the results have been very satisfactory in the Senator's case.

I want to say in answer to this general proposition—and I did not desire to get into a long discussion, because I wish to yield the floor—I wish to say in this general connection that I understood the draft was to be conducted on the theory that the unnecessary men were to be drafted and that the industrial structure was not to be disorganized and broken up by the selection of the best-fitted men. I understood that the best-fitted men—who, of course, are the men who are now busy and who were busy at the time that law passed—would be allowed to carry on the work of the country, and that those who were in occupations from which they could be spared and those who were not occupied would be drawn. The theory seems to be developing that we should now draft the best ones, regardless of occupation. I should like to see, myself, under a general selective draft, a great many of our so-called undesirable citizens drafted into the Army and put into training camps.

They might not be fitted for soldiers in a month or in a year, but I should like to see them put into training camps and given an opportunity to have, as the Senator has said, their manhood restored. And let me say this: Every one of those men, with a very few exceptions—that is, I am excepting degenerates who are incapable of development—almost every one of those men who is not a defective or a degenerate is the product of an inadequate educational system, largely. We need more industrial education. Many of these men are victims of the lack of industrial educational facilities in this country.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator has been very generous in yielding to interruptions, and I dislike very much to interrupt him again; but I think it is important to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that the great disturbing element is that of taking the farmer boy away from the farm with the idea of supplanting that same laborer with men who know nothing at all about farm work.

The Senator knows, as every man who is familiar with agricultural conditions knows, that in this day farm labor does not consist of taking hold of a hoe handle or the handle of a spade. It means the operation of intricate modern machinery, and I do not care how many men you take and put in their places, you will not be able to supply the very efficient labor which has been taken away from the farm to do the work. That necessarily adds to the cost of the farm products.

I want to say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that I have received a great many letters on this subject from farmers. They are loath to complain about conditions, because they do not want to be put in the position of being disloyal to the Government or being called slackers, because they are not. They are willing to do their bit in this war. But they have called my attention to the fact that a serious condition does exist, because if the experienced farm boys are taken away the farmers will no more be able to get men to take their places than would be the men in the factories to get new, green men to take the places of experienced men.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator is absolutely correct in his statement. Farming is a highly technical profession, and I agree entirely with what the Senator has said.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me it ought to be said, in addition, that not only is it true that the farmer has, as has been stated, to operate and handle and understand intricate machinery, know all about the handling of stock, and know all about grain and how to handle that and all the other products, but there never was a condition before in any war that ever existed where the question of food production was comparatively as important as it is in this one, where practically thirty or fifty million people have gone out of the productive ranks and have commenced to destroy property. The burden of feeding the armies and the people of a good many countries is mainly on the shoulders of America, so that food is more important than it ever has been before in any other war.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator is absolutely correct; and I desire to say that the allies are counting upon getting from us, and are absolutely depending upon getting, in my opinion, more grain than we can possibly ship them from this year's crop.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, right there I should like to stick a pin, and ask Senators to consider this question:

We have this year, according to the report of the Agricultural Department, a crop of over six thousand million bushels of foodstuffs. Over three thousand millions of that is corn. It is said to be the largest crop ever produced. Of course part of this is prognostication; but the Agricultural Department, I take it, is not given to exaggeration. Now, get the figures—six thousand million bushels of food products, three thousand millions of that being corn, approximately 650,000,000 bushels of it being wheat, and I think in the neighborhood of 300,000,000 bushels of it potatoes. I may be very far from right about the latter figure, but at all events it is the largest potato crop that we have ever raised.

Now, is it not true, Senators, that the problem is not one of production at all, but one of carriage? Is it not true that we have produced now more than we can get to our allies? And is it not true that at any normal time and in any normal year we can produce more than we can get to Europe unless we can vastly increase the ocean carrying business?

Mr. FRANCE. I believe that the Senator and I are not at variance.

Mr. REED. No; I think not, but I want to call attention to it.

Mr. FRANCE. Of course I have been insisting upon the necessity for greater production, but I am speaking particularly of next year. I will say with reference to the Senator's figures, however, that unfortunately the corn crop, while it will be large, only shows a probable increase of, I believe, something like 14 per cent over last year. I have not the figures before me, but I believe that is the correct figure as I saw it in the report the other day. Now, I feel myself that a 14 per cent increase in corn over last year is hardly enough to offset the decrease in wheat, and consequently to enable us to avoid a very severe pinch later on in the year; but, of course, the question brought up by the Senator, which has been so ably insisted upon before, of transportation and of the submarine reducing our supply of foodstuffs by its operations is a most important one, and one which I think has not received the attention which it should have received.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, ought not the Senator to place in the RECORD just at this time the fact that our allies have never been a corn-consuming people? They know how to make bread of wheat flour. They know little or nothing about the use of corn, as we do in many parts of the United States, and our wheat crop is exceedingly short.

Mr. FRANCE. That is probably true.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator allow me to inject this? No white man who has arrived at the age of 21 years ever starved to death when he was close enough to a corncrib so that he could get at it; and it is absolutely absurd to say, as Mr. Hoover is constantly saying, that the people of Europe or the armies of Europe are liable to starve to death for want of wheat while we are able to furnish them corn. It may be that they are not accustomed to eating it, and it may be that they will take a little training; but I say to the Senator from North Dakota, whom I very greatly respect—and I do not say this in a controversial way—that the armies of France and the armies of England will have an appetite for corn as soon as they have gone two hours beyond their regular meal time; and if these people do not know how to cook it there are enough of Pershing's men over there now to teach the whole line of troops how to make corn-meal mush and how to make corn bread, and teach them in 30 days.

It is an absolute absurdity to have this talk constantly put upon our country, without any reply, that the people of Europe will starve to death even if we get corn to them. It may not be just what they want; but when the fact is known, as I know it to be a fact from men who have been on the ground, that in Germany they are actually mixing straw with their bread, I have no hesitancy in saying that if you could get Indian corn into Germany those people would fight to get at it. So I am making this interruption, with the kindness of the Senator, in the interest of truth.

I appreciate the fact that we need wheat; I appreciate the fact that the world would like to have wheat; but I say that the talk of the world starving to death as long as there are 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn produced in this country and plenty of corn produced in other countries, and starving to death because it will not eat corn, does not stand to reason.

I think if we had somebody who knew a little more about food than Mr. Hoover does, who had lived in this country in the last 15 or 20 years, we would not have so much trouble about saving pie crust; we would be talking about teaching people to use corn and teaching them over in Europe to use it. For my part, I have mighty little patience with a man who wants to cut down the size of the American loaf of bread or to tell the American housewife she ought not to have flour for her babies and that she ought to eat corn meal and feed it to her family, but that the stomachs of Europe are too delicate for corn products.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me just at that point, the Senator has been making a very practical argument, and I think we should hold close to the practical side of this situation. Sentiment does count for a good deal. A sentiment in favor of one kind of food that a nation has been using is an important factor to deal with. When the allies were bidding against each other, sending our wheat up a dollar within a few days and to over $3 a bushel, they were not interfering with the corn crop. Now we are attempting to legislate to prevent a repetition of that act. The fact that these people will bid for wheat, the fact that our own Department of War insists that our own soldiers shall take wheat bread and not corn bread, is a fact that we must take cognizance of.

Allow me to say right here, a short time ago a gentleman with wonderful experience in the production of different kinds of flour presented through me a proposal to the War Department that he would produce whole-wheat flour at every one of the camps in the United States, which would be the most nutritious flour that could possibly be produced; that he could produce it with small portable mills where it could be baked the same day, and one mill would take care of 5,000 soldiers and have it ready for their use even in this country. The War Department replied, and replied truly, that whole-wheat flour has not the lasting qualities in all kinds of weather. Meal spoils in shipment across the ocean. We must have something that will stand the test of climate, and corn meal will not stand it. Therefore for our own soldiers we must have the wheat flour and the white wheat flour of the old make.

Now, the foreigners understand this as well as we do, and while there is no danger, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, of anyone starving as long as there are potatoes within reach as well as corn, it is a practical question, for our allies in Europe demand for their armies at present wheat, and that demand is a living demand, and it does act upon our wheat prices.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Maryland, of course it acts upon our wheat prices, and, of course, they prefer wheat. The proposition I am talking about is that of feeding. The Senator suggests that corn meal does not keep in certain climates. Flour does not keep in certain climates unless you keep it right. But the Senator will hardly say to me that shelled corn, properly barreled, will not keep in any European climate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Corn unground ought to keep. We keep it, of course, for a considerable period; but if we sent it to the Philippine Islands, for instance, it would not last very long.

Mr. REED. I am talking about European countries.

Mr. McCUMBER. But it can be so protected that it will last a reasonable length of time if it is ground over there. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. REED. Certainly that is true. We all know that the climate of France is but little different from our climate. We know the climate of Germany is very little different from the climate of the State of Iowa. We all know that the moisture in those countries does not greatly exceed that of this country, and it is just as practical to keep corn meal over there as it is here.

I am speaking about this matter in great earnestness, because we have had it constantly presented to us that if our wheat crop is a little short the world is going to starve to death. Nothing of that kind is the case. As long as you can get plenty of corn you are safe from starvation.

I repeat it is absurd to be asking the people of this country to live on corn meal one day of the week and not expect our allies in Europe to eat some corn meal also; and if they are really at the point of want, of hunger, I am sure there will be no difficulty in taking care of them if we can get the vessels to get the food across the ocean. Now, that is the real trouble with them to-day.

The Senator who has made this most interesting and learned speech, and I take this occasion to compliment him publicly, a speech that has thought in it and which will live long beyond the furious utterances that we sometimes hear upon this floor—the Senator who has made this speech knows that we had a shortage in this country of cars. We could not get cars to haul anything, and when we went to hunt the cars we found them in the yards, in the terminals, at the great shipping points of our country, at the great ports, loaded, and some of them had stood there loaded for weeks or even months waiting to ship their contents over to Europe.

The real problem to-day is that problem; and, of course, coupled with it is the problem of looking out for next year. I am in hearty accord with what the Senator says about encouraging production, but we ought to let it be understood that the question to-day is not one of starvation; it is a question of conservation and of transportation, and next year seeing to it that we have an enlarged crop, when we may hope to have more boats.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FRANCE. I will yield to the Senator if he will just allow me to make a brief statement in answer to the queries of the Senators. I will say that I believe there is no real difference between us. I think that all who have given attention to the subject of national habits and tastes will admit that great social unrest might well come as a result of any of these nations being put upon an unusual diet long before actual starvation came. We have unrest here already because our people are threatened with a certain change in their habits of eating.

I simply wanted to make the observation that social unrest and social disturbance may come long before real physical hunger and starvation are reached. Of course, the heroism of any people and the soundness of any nation are tested by the way in which it first meets altered living conditions which result from war, and by the spirit in which it afterwards meets, perhaps, actual hunger or even approaching starvation. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I was very much interested in the statement made by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to the effect that corn and corn products could not be shipped. I have before me the Statistical Abstract. I notice here given the quantities shipped of corn and corn products, and a footnote says these figures include corn meal for consumption at the rate of four bushels to a barrel. Last year we shipped 39,896,928 bushels; in 1905, 50,668,303 bushels; in 1900, 213,123,412 bushels. The figures vary from year to year, but they show a very substantial shipment of corn and corn products.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator evidently misunderstood my statement. On the contrary, I stated that corn, if it is unground, can be very easily shipped and very easily cared for, but that the corn meal itself requires greater care to prevent spoiling than does the ordinary wheat flour, and for that reason objection seems to be made against it as food for soldiers. I am giving the statement of others, not my own. No one questions that year after year we have been shipping corn to Europe not ground into corn meal, but ground into meal over there.

Mr. POMERENE. The figures here include corn meal, but the table does not give the proportion of corn and of corn meal. I think there is something in the statement which indicates that it must be shipped with greater care. We know from our own experience that it will not keep as well as wheat flour.

Mr. McCUMBER. Even whole wheat flour will not keep nearly as well as the higher grades of flour; it requires a great deal more protection.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to finish. I know that the questions and the remarks of the Senators who have interrupted me have, probably, been more illuminating than the remarks which I desired to make. At the same time I hope that they will share with me the responsibility for delaying the Senate so long. I know that after a busy week some of us had hoped to adjourn or take a recess early to-day. What I originally had planned to say would not have taken over 25 or 30 minutes. So I ask those, who have shared in the discussion, to share also in the responsibility for delaying the Senate so long.

I wish now to read the quotation before mentioned. It will take only a few minutes to express, by means of this quotation, in language applied to another phase of the price fixation question, my views upon this bill. Mr. Allen Albert said, in this paper read in 1912:

> The objections to this plan, in my judgment, are these:
> 1. It involves a further extension of the functions of the Government before the people may be said fairly to have proved their capability to administer the Government in its existing functions.
>
> 2. The machinery to administer this plan would prove the largest institution in the Government, I believe, in the history of Government; and every consideration of prudence requires, if it is to be brought into existence, that it should be done gradually.
>
> 3. A commission competent to do this work would be competent likewise to usher in that earthly paradise which is the heaven of all Marxian socialists.
>
> 4. How often, or at what intervals, or in response to what changes, or at whose instance should the prices so fixed afterwards be changed?
>
> 5. The commission would face special difficulties in the protective tariff, the existence of patent rights and copyrights, properly or improperly used, in changes of national administration, in uneven tax levies, in changes of our system of currency, even in differences of climate.
> 6. It would involve a radical readjustment of present methods of taxing corporations, probably an ultimate reorganization of all American taxing agencies.

7. Every economic probability is against the acceptance of such prices when they have been fixed.
8. The plan is materially incomplete.
9. The assumption that natural monopolies extend beyond the field of public utilities is not justified.

I would say to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that my remarks this afternoon are largely confined, as he may have noticed, to the subject of the food supply, and they are not as applicable to those articles which are produced by industries which are natural or practical monopolies, industries, of course, which we have already seen fit to regulate by statutes heretofore enacted.

Lastly:

10. No government in any modern State can expect to maintain prices, no matter how fixed, unless those prices approximate the normal or natural prices fixed by economic conditions.

I have confidence in the good judgment and ability of the Senators who constitute the Committee on Agriculture and I am certain that they could formulate, in consultation with experts from the Department of Agriculture, legislation looking to food conservation and production which would be safe, conservative, constructive, a rational cure for the unnecessary and intolerable ills from which the masses of our people are now so sorely suffering. I believe that such a measure would be framed with a due appreciation of the fact that the productive, and not the administrative, problem is the chief one in connection with the food supply of the Nation. Such a bill might embrace provision for a careful inventory of the man power of the Nation; an extension of State and Federal employment bureaus; the organization of agricultural reserve corps; the registration of farmers for farm and crop surveys; appropriations for correspondence and consultation with farmers for suggestions and information; news and market letters on price conditions; a nation-wide propaganda for increased acreage and food economy; information and distribution bureaus for seed and fertilizer; protection of the manufacture and movement of fertilizer; freight concessions on fertilizers and ingredients; organizations to meet seasonal emergencies; utilization of the advice of retired farmers; and many other conservative or more drastic measures as might seem desirable to meet particular conditions.

It would be impossible for me at this time to discuss the many provisions of this bill, which I deem to be most dangerous. It seems to me to be founded upon a number of utterly erroneous assumptions.

It assumes, as I have said, that faults in the mechanism of distribution, food corners, and price manipulation have been the chief factors in causing the rise of the cost of food; that distribution by governmental administration would be more economical and effective than that which takes place as a result of the operation of the mechanisms of distribution under natural law controlled by governmental regulation; that governmental management can conduct the business of the country more efficiently than individual enterprise; that the judgment and will of a few governmental officials can function more efficiently in carrying on the work of the Nation than can the combined judgment and will of the social whole; that public officials are more patriotic and trustworthy than private citizens; that government by men is better than government by law.

Mr. President, we have been hearing constantly of late the statement that autocracies are more efficient than democracies. I want to say that this is a statement proved false by every fact of history. I do not subscribe to the doctrine that democracy is a fair-weather government, nor shall I ever entertain such a theory in my consideration of legislation which is presented to us here.

In conclusion I would say that I am opposed to price fixation by legislation. The supporters in the Senate of this bill seem to be occupying the position of statesmen in the past who have sought to pay the producers higher prices for grain while securing for the consumers lower prices for bread. Surely subsection b of section 8 must have been modeled upon one of the old Roman grain laws under which grain was bought at a price to protect the producer and sold at a much lower price to suit the capacity of the consumer. A low minimum price for wheat would not stimulate production and a high minimum would, as has been shown so clearly by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], unduly burden the consumer. A strong statement issued by the Government to every farmer in the land to the effect that in all probability, regardless of the size of the crop, wheat will probably range in price next year from $1.75 to $2.75 per bushel and perhaps higher, stating the reasons for such conclusion and urging the farmer as a patriotic citizen to seed a maximum acreage, would, if we meet the farm-labor situation, be as effective in stimulating an increased seeding as a guaranteed minimum price. With a properly conducted propaganda, by national unity of effort we can, I believe, vastly increase our production of grain.

As I said a short while since, a 2,000,000,000-bushel wheat crop might be well within our capacity. Think what another billion bushels of wheat would mean to this country. In my thinking upon economic subjects I have never been able to get very far away from the old French physiocratic school of economists who believed that all wealth comes from the soil. Certain it is that the wealth produced by the creation of a large amount of additional wheat added to the wealth of the country would tend to reduce the burden of taxation which this war will create, and reduce the percentage of liability which we are creating in piling up this huge national debt.

I think this is a phase of the matter that should be considered in connection with this whole question, that a continued increased production not only would relieve the food situation but would in a large sense, relieve the financial pressure which we are beginning to feel as a result of the debt which we have already created, and as a result of the taxes which must be collected for appropriations which we have already made, and which we must yet make.

Now, I do not wish to be misunderstood, but I can not agree with much that has been said in this Chamber during the debate upon this bill. I am not ready yet to subscribe to the doctrine and to legislate upon the theory, in this national emergency, that we have a Nation filled with "traitors," "vampires," "food pirates," "plunderers," "criminals," and "anarchists," men ready, on the one hand, to take advantage of the situation to wring the lifeblood from their fellow citizens, and men, on the other hand, ready to start a revolution at the first sacrifice that may be required. I can not legislate with any such theory in my mind.

I do not believe that the spirit of this Nation is being given proper expression in this pending legislation. Our citizens believe that we have yet a country worth fighting for. I believe that it is a Nation yet of devoted patriots, ready to dare all, to sacrifice all, and even to die for its preservation. That is how we feel in Maryland. We must remember that unity of action in the American spirit alone can win this war. Let us eliminate from our legislation that spirit of distrust, suspicion, and malignancy which has during recent weeks been given too frequent expression. If our people can not be trusted under the laws to conduct their business honestly and patriotically in this great emergency, then indeed has this war uncovered a condition of national decadence and decay hitherto unsuspected. "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." You can not win this war by enacting drastic, despotic, un-American legislation; you can only win it by arousing the American spirit for the defense of the American ideal of democracy by and for all, by invoking the deep and patriotic devotion of our people, by constructive legislation conceived in an intelligent understanding of all of the difficulties which, because of war, must attend productive effort, by calling every citizen to join in a spirit of conciliation and cooperation to do not his English "bit" but his American best in helping to perfect an invincible national organization.

Mr. President, I close with an apology for having taken up so much time, which I would not have done had it not been for the many interruptions.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to submit a report from the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask the Senator from Oregon if he will let me present it now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Very well.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it the purpose of the Senator in charge of the bill to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside that the report may be disposed of?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That may be done, if there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, and the report will be received.

SAN DIEGO AVIATION STATION.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 4892) authorizing the President to take possession, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation school purposes, of the whole of North Island in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 83) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the committee was, on page 3, line 1, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out the proviso in the following words:

Provided, That no compromise or settlement of claims to title to said lands shall be made involving the payment of more than $500,000.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause possession to be taken forthwith, on behalf of the United States, for use for national defense and in connection therewith as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation school purposes, of the whole of North Island, in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and the provisions of section 355, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to the expenditure of any appropriations for improvements thereon for aviation purposes.

The Attorney General or the claimants to the said North Island are authorized to make application for the determination and appraisement of any rights private parties may have in the said island over and beyond any rights thereto in the United States to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California; the proceedings to be prosecuted in accordance with the laws of the State of California relating to the condemnation of property for public use. Either party may take an appeal from the judgment of such court direct to the Supreme Court of the United States within 90 days after such judgment is rendered. Upon the final ascertainment of the value of any right, title, or interest adjudged to be in any private claimants to the said island there shall be paid into court the value of the same as so determined, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from date possession thereof was taken as herein authorized; and thereupon the United States shall be vested with title to said lands. The amount so paid shall be distributed by order of the court to the owner or owners of such right, title, or interest in said island as their respective interests may be determined by the court. The amount necessary to pay the awards in favor of private claimants is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise specifically appropriated, to be disbursed under orders of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the report accompanying the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 83, 65th Cong.]

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4892) authorizing the President to take possession, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation-school purposes, of the whole of North Island, in the Harbor of San Diego, Cal., and for other purposes, having considered the same, report thereon with an amendment, recommend that it do pass, and submit the following letter from the Secretary of War in support thereof:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 17, 1917.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The question of the selection of a site for an aviation school was considered by a commission appointed under act of Congress approved March 4, 1915 (38 Stat., 1064); the commission recommending the purchase of a site on North Island, San Diego Harbor, Cal., then in use by the aviation school, as the best site for the purpose, provided the Government has such rights therein, that the site could be obtained at a reasonable cost. If the Government has no such rights the commission recommended as its second choice the acquisition of a site on Coronado Heights, San Diego, Cal., expressing the opinion that $300,000 would be a fair and equitable estimate for this site.

Based on the said estimate, an appropriation was made in the Army appropriation act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat., 622), the language of the appropriation reading as follows:

"For the acquisition by purchase or by condemnation of a site or sites in the State of California for an aviation school and training grounds of the Signal Corps of the United States Army, not to exceed $300,000."

The naval appropriation act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat., 556, 568), contains an item authorizing the Secretary of the Navy "to purchase 232 acres of land on or near the Bay of San Diego, San Diego County, Cal., to be used for advance base, expeditionary, and aviation purposes, to cost not exceeding $250,000: Provided, That at the same time the city of San Diego, San Diego County, Cal., donates, free of encumbrance, to the United States Government a parcel of 500 acres of adjoining tide lands of the Bay of San Diego, known as Dutch Flat, without cost to the United States Government, for the purpose of establishing a naval base thereon."

Following these appropriations the question of the acquisition of lands at San Diego, Cal., for aviation purposes was taken up with the naval board with the view of the acquisition of an area on North Island, by the consolidation of both appropriations, sufficient for the needs of both departments. It was the view of the board, concurred in by the commanding officer of the Army aviation school at San Diego, Cal., that North Island was large enough to accommodate the needs of both the Army and the Navy, and that the site would be immediately available for use without any additional outlay of money for the improvement of the land, while Coronado Heights would require approximately $250,000 to improve the land alone so as to nearly accommodate the present demands of Army aviation at San Diego.

The question has received further consideration by a joint board of Army and Navy officers. The report of this board, dated May 5, 1917, has received the approval of the heads of both departments and the findings and recommendations of the board, as approved, are as follows:

"The board is of the opinion that North Island, San Diego, Cal., is the best location in this country for the establishment of a joint Army and Navy aviation station for the primary training of pilots. The question of the legal ownership of North Island, and also the high price requested of the Government by its claimants, have prevented for a period of several years the final determination of the site for a Government aviation training station in southern California.

"The board recommends that the authority of Congress be obtained for immediately taking possession of North Island, San Diego, Cal., for the joint uses of the Army and Navy air services * * *. The question of compensation can be settled at some later date."

I have the honor, therefore, to submit a draft of an act for authorizing the President to take possession of North Island for the aviation needs of the Army and Navy, giving the claimants to the said island the right to proceed in the courts for the determination and appraisement of any rights they may have in the said island over and beyond the rights of the United States thereto, and making an appropriation of the amount necessary to pay the awards in their favor. The act has been so drawn, in view of the fact that the title of the claimants to North Island rests on the confirmation of a Mexican grant, under which grant the Government of Mexico retained the right to take and use the lands for certain defensive purposes. The matter has received consideration by the Department of Justice, which department expresses the opinion that, notwithstanding the issue of a patent based on the confirmation of the Mexican grant, the Government may legally claim the right to use these lands for the purposes specified in the Mexican grant, provided such right is asserted by congressional action. The question is not free from doubt, and it is the view of this department that the legislation should provide, as in the draft submitted, for the determination of the respective rights of the claimants and the Government to these lands and for the payment to the claimants of the appraised value of any rights they may have in said island over and beyond the rights of the United States in the premises. It is accordingly recommended that the legislation take this form and that authority be granted as promptly as possible.

Very respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

The bill provides for the taking possession of the whole of North Island, in San Diego Bay, Cal., as a site for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation school purposes. Provision is made for just compensation to be paid to private parties claiming rights in the said island.

Appropriations aggregating $550,000 for aviation and other purposes for the Army and Navy were made by Congress in the Army and Navy appropriation acts of August 29, 1916, and a board considering a site for the Army recommended, first, the location on North Island then being used by the Signal Corps for aviation purposes. The matter was taken up with the naval board with the view of the acquisition of an area on North Island by the consolidation of both appropriations, sufficient for the needs of both departments. A joint Army and Navy board, after considering the situation and the cost of improvements that would be required if any site other than North Island was obtained, recommended that authority from Congress be obtained for taking possession of North Island. The question of the legal ownership and the prices asked by those claiming rights in the island have prevented for several years the final determination of a site for Government aviation purposes in California. The findings of the joint Army and Navy board were that North Island is the best location in this country for the establishment of a joint Army and Navy aviation station for the primary training of pilots.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE FALL OF THE BASTILLE.

Mr. NEW. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Senate resolution 104.

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States felicitates the Republic of France upon the occasion of the celebration of the one hundred and twenty-eighth anniversary of the fall of the Bastille, that noted memorial and symbol of centuries of misrule, oppression, and exploitation of the mass of French people for the benefit of the aristocracy.

Resolved, That as the Stars and Stripes of America mingle with the tricolor of France and the troops of the sister Republics march to the same martial music in celebrating the triumph of popular government, our hearts unite with those of the French people in the hope that the present assault against the mightiest citadel of caste, privilege, oppressive power, and tyranny the world has ever known—against the bastille of autocratic militarism—may soon be as triumphantly and finally ended.

POEM BY SELMA KATZENSTEIN.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have here the words of a patriotic song composed by Selma Katzenstein, of Dallas, Tex., entitled "All Hail, America!" which I wish to have inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ALL HAIL, AMERICA!

[By Selma Katzenstein, of Dallas, Tex.]

Dear land of ours, may heavenly powers
Protect and guard thee ever,
And guide thy path and give thee faith
And joy in high endeavor,
To seek the light in honor's eyes,
Nor be content with lesser prize,
To strive to win a noble fight
In God's holy sight.

We'll sing in praise of other days
And many a deed of glory
Of thy great past, whose fame shall last
And ring thro' song and story;
Of triumphs of thy daughters fair,
In noble lives beyond compare,
And battles by thy brave sons fought
And many a wonder wrought.

Not hate, but love, shall thy heart move
For men of every nation,
Whom wondrous fate sends to thy gate
To seek for their salvation.
Beneath thy skies they shall find rest
And joy and freedom on thy breast;
Their noble worth thou'lt reverent learn
And with love's ardor burn.

Thy hero sons shall train their guns
'Gainst wrong and fell oppression;
Brave love shall lead on honor's steed
And gain at last possession—
Of strongholds where the intrenched foe
Their flaunting tokens boldly show.
The banners of the right unfurled
Shall float o'er a new world!

CHORUS.

All hail, America!
Our love for her, a very star,
Shall light our way to heaven's door
And joy for evermore!

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. POMERENE. After consultation with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], I have modified to a certain extent the amendment which I submitted on yesterday to the pending bill. I ask leave to offer the amendment as modified at this time and that it be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

SEC. 3. No person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the United States in any capacity, including an advisory capacity, shall solicit, induce, or attempt to induce any person or officer, authorized to execute or to direct the execution of contracts on behalf of the United States, to make any contract or give any order for the furnishing to the United States of work, labor, or services, or of materials, supplies, or other property of any kind or character, if such agent or employee has any pecuniary interest in such contract or order, or if he or any firm of which he is a member, or corporation, joint-stock company, or association, of which he is an officer or stockholder or in the pecuniary profits of which he is directly or indirectly interested, shall be a party thereto. Nor shall any agent or employee make, or permit any committee or other body of which he is a member to make, or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States or any member or subordinate thereof without making to the best of his knowledge and belief a full and complete disclosure in writing to such council, board, commission, or subordinate of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and of his interest in any firm, corporation, company, or association being a party thereto, nor shall he participate in the awarding of such contract or giving such order. Any willful violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, no Senator has notified me that he cares to proceed with the discussion of the bill to-day; and if no Senator indicates a desire to do so, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., Saturday, July 14, 1917) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 16, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate July 14 (legislative day of July 12), 1917.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Justus S. Wardell, to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of California.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 14, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts unto Thee, O God, our Heavenly Father, from whom cometh all our strength and knowledge, every high and noble aspiration.

That we may be sufficient unto the needs of the day, impart unto us, we beseech Thee, of Thy strength and wisdom; quicken every noble impulse, every laudable purpose, that our work may be in consonance with Thy will. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 5405. An act making appropriations for certain session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5405. An act making appropriations for certain session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Mr. Eric B. Thompson, general counsel for the Proprietary Association, in regard to something I said about patent medicines.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAKER. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing two telegrams from California in relation to the food-control bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

RECORDS OF MILITARY ENLISTMENTS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent—the first time during this session of Congress—to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent—for the first time during this session—to extend his remarks in the RECORD. [Laughter.] Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, might I inquire upon what topic?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is on the subject of preserving a record in the various counties of the United States of the men who are in the military service.

I want to change that request, Mr. Speaker; I want to ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how it strikes the other Members of the House, but it seems to me there ought to be some systematic effort made by Congress or the State governments to preserve an official county war record in every county in the United States of the boys who have been enlisted and those who are hereafter to enlist or be drafted into the service, and have that record kept and preserved as a public document in the records of the county and also in the office of the secretary of state of each State. Such a record will be tremendously important in the future, not only to clearly show the standing of each county and let the local people and each State and county have full credit for all the boys that respond to our country's call, but the record will become a historic document. It will largely aid in determining questions of pensions and insurance and inheritances and many other matters. But aside from its practical importance, it is a duty that we owe to these boys to keep track of them as far as we possibly can.

I feel that there ought to be some war council or committee in every county authoritatively designated for the express purpose of systematically compiling and preserving that record, so that parents and friends may know, as near as possible, where the boys are and what they are doing.

For the purpose of calling the attention of Congress and the country to this subject, I have introduced House joint resolution No. 119, which reads as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 119) to provide for an official county war record of all men in the service of the United States.

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of compiling and preserving an accurate and complete record of all persons who have entered or may enter the service of the United States in connection with its military or naval operations during the existing war, and for the purpose of providing an official and authentic local record of the enrollment in service of all such persons who so enter the service from each county in the United States, the Council of National Defense be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to immediately, in cooperation with the governors and branch councils of national defense of the various States, create in each county an official war council or committee whose duty it shall be to compile and presgrve a complete and accurate record of all persons so engaged in the service of the United States, giving age, date of enlistment, draft or commission, branch or nature of service, and all data and information available concerning each person so engaged, and to continue the keeping of such records until the close of the war. Upon the termination of the war such records shall form a part of the official county records and shall be kept in the office of the county clerk or in such other office of the county as the legislature may direct.

I do not know that I can pass it, but it ought to pass; and I feel that I ought to call the attention of the House to this subject. I may say that I have already taken up this subject with the governor of Colorado and with every one of the 23 counties in my congressional district, and I understand that our governor and State legislature are going to make some effort along this line to have such a record compiled and kept in every county in the State of Colorado. The newspapers of Colorado have taken up the subject, and I am confident that we are going to preserve such a record, so that the parents will know something about where the boys are, in what regiments and companies, and how to address them, and, in case they become wounded and get into hospitals, afford some speedy opportunity for possibly extending some relief. We will all be besieged with many requests of this kind in the near future, and I feel that if these local county records are kept at home it will be a great comfort and satisfaction both to the parents and the boys themselves and have a splendid influence.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not this information already duly compiled by the War Department, and will it not eventually be placed in a public document?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes; eventually, after the war is over that record will be a public document here in Washington. As a matter of fact the War Department here is some one, two, or three thousand miles away, and it is a very slow process to write to Washington when parents at home want to know about their boys in the field. I want to see a complete record made now, right at home, so that every parent can see it if necessary.

Mr. DOWELL. And could not that matter be brought to Congress and placed in a public document, and then sent to the various counties?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That would take too long and would not answer the immediate purpose during the war. But I will say that if anybody has a better suggestion, all right; it is the thought I have in view, of letting the parents at home and boys in the field know that we are trying to keep track of them as best we can. The lessons of our Civil War conclusively demonstrate not only the wisdom but the absolute necessity of a local home record of this kind.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is not this all done automatically by the operation of the conscription law?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I do not think it is.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not every State have the record of the men who are enlisted and of those who are exempted?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is no record locally, as I understand it, of those who have already enlisted. There ought to be a local record of all those now in the Army and Navy and every branch of the Government service, as well as those that will soon be drafted.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What authority has the Federal Congress to impose such a burden as that of keeping a record of that kind upon the county officials of the States?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My thought is that the Council of National Defense has the right to take it up with the governor of each State and with each local council of defense and have this record compiled without any expense or delay or trouble whatever.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is this not a matter of local law?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is a humane matter. It will not require any law.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, under the conscription law every State gets credit for the number of men who have enlisted in the Regular Army or the National Guard since April 1 of this year. Therefore each State has that record now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is exactly the Army view of the thing. In other words, that a man in the Army is merely a unit; that he simply means one; men merely count in numbers, each State's quota. As a matter of fact, the mothers and fathers of the boys have an individual human interest in them and their welfare. They would like to know where the boys are and what they are doing and what becomes of them. When a soldier has a leg shot off and is in the hospital his parents would like to know what company he is in, so that they can communicate with him through their Congressman. [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to ask the gentleman how he would get that from the State. He would have to get that from the War Department.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If a committee in each county takes up that work now, they can get the data from the parents. It would be an easy matter, comparatively, to make a complete record now. But it will be impossible to ever make or get a correct record six months from now. I am firmly convinced that this matter is of the utmost importance, and I earnestly hope that Congress will enact my resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, conditions have changed lately, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to the extent of about 100 words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is it upon the same subject that the gentleman asked heretofore?

Mr. RAKER. It is in regard to Herbert Hoover and the opinion of those who know him——

Mr. WALSH. And does it include the telegrams the gentleman has mentioned?

Mr. RAKER. About 100 words, the two of them.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman upon what topic?

Mr. KING. While I deny the right of the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

INCREASE OF SIGNAL CORPS.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5326) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and for other purposes, and pending that I ask that all general debate on this bill be considered as now closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5326, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that all general debate be considered closed. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. ANDERSON objected.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill shall not exceed one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota objects, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5326) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army, and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and for other purposes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, the report that accompanies this bill states substantially everything that I could fairly and justly state on the floor of the House. This bill provides for the temporary increase of the Signal Corps, particularly the Aviation Section thereof. It is limited to the existing emergency. It authorizes the President in general terms to organize this temporary force into divisions, brigades, regiments, wings, squadrons, battalions, companies, and flights. The act itself does not fix the number of any of these different organizations, but leaves that entirely to the discretion of the President. The object of that, Mr. Chairman, is readily seen. If by law Congress should undertake to fix the number of machines that will be constructed and to declare the number of men that will be employed in this temporary additional service, and all of the details with regard to the same, it would destroy the very purpose of this legislation. It would give to the enemy the very thing that the enemy ought not to know. The bill does carry a lump-sum appropriation of $640,000,000.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. On the point of specifying the number of enlisted men and the number of officers authorized for this branch of the service and that it would be giving up military secrets, was not that the exact situation in regard to all previous legislation—that we specified 500,000 men and another 500,000, and authorized the increase of the Regular Army and the National Guard to a certain amount? Why would it be giving up secrets in regard to the Aviation Corps any more than to any other branch of the service?

Mr. DENT. In answer to the gentleman's question I will state that this is a peculiarly technical force expected to be used in certain instances against the enemy across the water. It will be some time before we organize the full strength of the Regular Army or the National Guard or the National Army as authorized by law. There is no limitation, I will say to the gentleman, except the amount of the appropriation, upon the size of the National Guard. The law simply provides that there may be organized in each State of the Union a National Guard of at least 800 for every Senator and every Member of Congress. It fixes the minimum, not the maximum. So that the only limitation upon that would be the appropriation that Congress gives in order to support it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It has been published repeatedly—the estimate sanctioned by the War Department of the number of men necessary to recoup the National Guard up to the war strength. I would like to ask one further question. The gentleman appreciates that it is asking a great deal of Congress to pass a bill in such an indefinite form as this, although it may be justified. I should like to inquire of the gentleman if the verbal provisions of this bill have had the approval of the General Staff or the War College? I do not mean the program; I do not mean the propriety of establishing the branch of the service, or the number of aeroplanes and the number of fliers; but I mean the phraseology that works out the details. Can the gentleman inform me whether or not that has had the investigation and approval of the General Staff or War College?

Mr. DENT. Of both, as I understand it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand the gentleman is incorrectly informed as to that. I made inquiry last evening to see if the details of this bill have received the approval of the General Staff or the War College. I do not wish to be understood as saying that either the General Staff or the War College wishes to go on record as disapproving any of it, but I do think it is fair and just to the membership to say that I am informed that the War College has never passed on these details, but that the details are now before the War College for that very purpose.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman's information may be later than mine.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I got it after I talked with the gentleman in his office yesterday, so he knows when that was.

Mr. DENT. But the Secretary of War has been before the committee, and he told the committee that this bill had been thoroughly examined and approved. The Chief of the Signal Corps appeared before the committee and explained the bill fully, in detail, and he said that it had been approved, and we assumed that it had been approved by the War Department.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman stated that there was no limitation upon the number of the National Guard. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that while there is no limitation there is no power in the Federal Government to increase the National Guard, other than to fill up deficiencies in existing regiments when they are called into the Federal service?

Mr. DENT. Oh, no. The gentleman is very much mistaken about that. The Federal Government can authorize the organization of additions to the National Guard.

Mr. LENROOT. My question is, can it compel it?

Mr. DENT. Oh, no.

Mr. LENROOT. So there is no power in the Federal Government to increase the National Guard. There is that limitation.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SEARS. On page 7 of this bill, line 12, and following, notice that it provides for—

(a) The acquisition of land, or any interest in land with any buildings and improvements thereon, by purchase, lease, donation, condemnation, or otherwise; (b) the improvement of such land by clearing, grading, draining, seeding, and otherwise making the same suitable for the purpose intended; (c) the construction, maintenance, and repair of permanent or temporary barracks, quarters, hospitals, mess houses, administration, instructional and recreational buildings, hangars, magazines, storehouses, sheds, shops, garages, boathouses, docks, radio stations, laboratories, observation stations, and all other buildings and structures necessary or advisable—

And on page 8, line 6—

(e) construction and repair of roads, walks, sea walls, breakwaters, bridges and wharves, dredging, filling and otherwise improving land and water sites.

How much of this $640,000,000 is contemplated to be expended for the purpose of repairing sea walls, and building sea walls, roads and bridges, and the acquisition of permanent sites, and the construction of permanent buildings?

Mr. DENT. The committee has that information, and that is one of the matters that we were asked to keep in the archives of the committee. I have definitely all of that information. It was before the committee, it is in the possession of the committee, the committee expects to preserve it, and any Member who wishes to see it in the committee room is at liberty at any time to do so.

Mr. SEARS. Does the chairman of the committee believe it would be giving information to the enemy before the passage of this bill to state how much would be spent on roads and how much land would be bought, when the day after it is bought and these buildings are started the enemy would know it anyway?

Mr. DENT. If we gave information as to roads and sea walls, then somebody else would ask information about other things, and in that way, by putting two and two together, anyone reading the debate would know everything about it.

Mr. SEARS. Is it not barely possible that if all this money was to be spent in some particular part of the country, without reference to other parts of the country, it might cause more confusion than the giving of some information to the enemy?

Mr. DENT. I hardly think that is true.

Mr. BURNETT. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. BURNETT. The appropriation carried in this bill is a very large one, and I have no doubt a wise one. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the appropriation is sufficient to enable the bureau having charge of this work to answer letters addressed to them by Members of Congress? I ask this question because almost two weeks ago I wrote what I thought were two respectful letters to them, and up to this time I have not been able to get any reply whatever, and I want to know if the gentleman has made due allowance for stationery and other things to enable them to answer letters addressed to them by Members of Congress?

Mr. DENT. Perhaps the reason the gentleman has not heard from them is because the work is heavy, and they have not a sufficient force. This bill provides for a largely increased clerical force.

Mr. BURNETT. Does the gentleman think they could not keep up within two weeks with their correspondence?

Mr. DENT. My colleague knows that I am not responsible for that, and that I can not answer that question.

Mr. BURNETT. I wish to ask another question. A month or more ago I asked them in regard to a very efficient man, as I think, entering the aviation service and the first question they asked me was whether or not he was a college man. I said, "No; he is not." Then he said that he could not get in unless he was a college man or the equivalent thereof. I asked him what was meant by the equivalent thereof, and I was told that he had to have three years of college training. I now desire to ask how these drafts can occur, how men can be drafted into the service, when a little bureau autocracy is going to make a college autocracy of it and prevent men from going in unless they are college men or the equivalent?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I will state to my colleague that that was the rule of the department at one time, but it has been changed.

Mr. BURNETT. I am very glad that they have reached a condition of sanity.

Mr. DENT. They have rescinded that order recently.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman state in round numbers how much money has been appropriated at this session of Congress for the Military Establishment?

Mr. DENT. I would have to stop and think about that, to be perfectly frank with the gentleman. I believe a large urgent deficiency appropriation bill carried $3,300,000,000. The regular Army appropriation bill carried about $278,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There were $2,200,000,000 for the Army.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This amount is entirely outside of any amount heretofore estimated for the Military Establishment?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Has the committee before it a statement as to where this money is to be expended? I refer to the various expenditures set forth in the bill.

Mr. DENT. The committee went through the appropriation feature of the bill, which is section 9, paragraph by paragraph, and the committee required the department to show what each particular paragraph of section 9 would cost, and that information is in the possession of the committee.

Mr. DOWELL. Then the committee has a detailed statement of the exact expenditures set forth in the bill?

Mr. DENT. Yes; just as near as it can possibly be obtained at this time.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any reason that should not be furnished to the House?

Mr. DENT. The War Department prefers that it should not be. The War Department thinks that that would be giving information that would interfere with their plans.

Mr. DOWELL. Could not that be furnished to the committee without being placed in the RECORD?

Mr. DENT. The committee has it, and the committee is perfectly willing it should be exhibited to Members. The information will be preserved in the archives of the committee, and any Member of Congress at any time is at liberty to go and examine it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call my colleague's attention to this fact. England has been at war with Germany for three years. England does not know to-day how many submarines Germany is turning out every week. It is kept a profound secret, and it has a depressing effect in England. Why can not this country, so far as its aviation force is concerned, keep its secret so as to prevent the enemy from getting any knowledge whatever of what we are going to do to get control of the air? [Applause.] It is as essential to-day for a nation to have control of the air as it is essential to have control of the sea. [Applause.] And if these matters are given out they will percolate eventually to the enemy. The important part in this war is this: If we tell the enemy what we are going to do in any branch of our service, he will get ready to meet us. Then, when we go over there with our flying machines, with our airplanes, he will be ready for us. It is therefore advisable that we keep this thing a profound secret. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why is it that the only place that it is feared to discuss these matters because they may become public is in the Congress of the United States charged with the responsibility for the information? I hold in my hand copies of the Official Bulletin, and if the gentleman desires information about the aeroplane service, he can find it quite voluminously set forth in statements issued by the Council of National Defense. But we must not discuss it here for fear somebody would discover what has happened! [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. The committee took occasion to call the attention of the Secretary of War to the information that has been disseminated from time to time through the Council of National Defense. That they have been doing it does not make it right. We might as well begin now to clamp down the lid. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If Germany knows that we appropriate $640,000,000 for the purpose of constructing aeroplanes, can not she approximate the number of aeroplanes that we make?

Mr. KAHN. No; because the aeroplanes are of different kinds, of different sizes. They cost all the way from $10,000 to $75,000 each, and it would be impossible to tell how many we have.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In what respect does the information that would be valuable to the enemy growing out of the discussion of this subject now differ from the information that was given out through the Council of National Defense to the press some two or three weeks ago? I took occasion some two weeks ago to criticize the information that has been given out through the War and Navy Departments with respect to aviation. Does it differ now from then?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman was quite right in criticizing the statements which were given out.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And has not Germany—have not the central powers—now all the information they have to have in respect to this matter?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think so. I do not think they have, and that is why I am asking the House to have confidence in its Committee on Military Affairs [applause], to have confidence in Gen. Squier, and to have confidence in the War Department. We will give you individual information any time you want it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If we are to suppress testimony here and the War Department gives out all the information they have, of what benefit has our secrecy been?

Mr. KAHN. Well, the Secretary informed the committee that so far as the War Department was concerned there will be no information given out regarding this subject in the future that might be helpful to the enemy. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Will not the gentleman call attention to the difference between this loose information floating through the newspapers and official action taken by the House of Representatives in appropriating money for different items in this bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I invite attention to the fact that it was not loose information given out by the War Department but published as official?

Mr. TILSON. But it did not give the details as to how much they were going to expend for each individual item.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have been interested in this subject of the development of aeronautics in this House when some people who are in favor of it now did not take any stock in it at all. I am one of those who believe in the United States keeping this as secret as possible from the enemy, but I want to ask the gentleman if the Secretary of War, as chairman of the Council of National Defense, ought not to be able to exercise the same censorship over that body as the gentleman thinks he can exercise over the War Department?

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will allow me, the Secretary informed the committee only day before yesterday, I believe——

Mr. HULBERT. I was present and heard the testimony, but nevertheless the information has been coming out since the Secretary made the statement which the gentleman is now going to quote.

Mr. KAHN. I do not understand anything additional has been given out by anybody. There was information given out some weeks ago. It was repeated two or three days ago, and I protested against such information being given out. I pointed out the necessity for keeping it secret. We are at war and war is not a game of "ping-pong."

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Thousands of men will give up their lives in this war, and we have to protect them as much as we can; we have to protect the interests of the country too, and when we give this information out in an official way, as we would through a full discussion in the House of Representatives, we supply the enemy with information that the enemy should not have.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. TEMPLE. Does not the gentleman recognize the possibility that some information that is supposed to have been given out may nevertheless contain certain inaccuracies?

Mr. KAHN. That is very true.

Mr. TEMPLE. So much the better.

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely. In fact it is one of the tricks of war to deceive your opponent with misinformation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not mean the Council of National Defense, whose official bulletins are published for the information of the public and Members of Congress, has been publishing erroneous information in order to fool somebody while instructing us, does he?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman heard me say two or three times that I did not approve of the information——

Mr. FITZGERALD. One report of the publicity agent bears out the gentleman's statement.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. WALSH. What is the difference in discussing this measure and discussing appropriations for submarines and later have a statement given out from the Navy Department that contracts had been let for so many submarines or so many other naval vessels?

Mr. KAHN. I believe all the information regarding submarines should be kept within the supervision of the Secretary of the Navy and the Committee on Naval Affairs. Japan for years has had a large building program and yet there is not a naval officer in this country who has accurate information from Japan with respect to what she is doing in building up her Navy.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. In regard to the question asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] in regard to the total amount of this appropriation, $640,000,000, which figures are going out to the world, he said that Germany knowing that fact can estimate how many machines we will make.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I beg the gentleman's pardon, I asked if Germany could not. I did not know whether she could or not, I did not assert it.

Mr. KAHN. She can not.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, the question I want to bring out is: Is not the great purpose of this bill not so much to construct a certain number of flying machines as to establish a policy and make preparation for the manufacture of machines, and those plans are the things we do not want the world to be familiar with?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly. We desire to devise a continuing policy for this war. This is the beginning, and from time to time Congress will be asked to supplement these appropriations.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe with the gentleman from California that this is about as important a proposition as any that has been brought up on this floor. But what are you going to do as to this situation? Here are individual Members of the House and of another body that are lambasting the administration because they can not get certain information. If they get it, they will scatter it like chaff to the wind. If the newspapers of this country can not go to the War Department and get the information, then they will commence a lambasting of the administration, and the result will be the administration will believe it better to give them practical information, positive information, or partial information, rather than having the press of the country making wild, fugitive statements about what we are doing. That is the situation, and I think it ought to be thrashed out here on the floor of the House to-day, whether or not the policy of the administration is going to be one of secrecy or complete and absolute information.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to my friend from Georgia that since the committee has been considering this very question various members of the press gallery have asked me for certain information. I stated to them what I believed ought to be the policy of Congress and the Government regarding this kind of information. I pointed out that in my judgment this force which will be necessary to secure control of the air ought not to be exploited in the papers, and every newspaper man with whom I spoke agreed with me absolutely and said that nothing that might be of service to the enemy ought to be published.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. All of that was discussed in the papers.

Mr. KAHN. Some time ago.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. A month ago.

Mr. KAHN. But not the details of anything that was given to the Committee on Military Affairs while the committee was in executive session. Those matters have not been printed, and, as I understand, will not be printed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. KAHN. I am taking the time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

Mr. DENT. That is all right.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me two or three minutes?

Mr. DENT. I will yield as much time as the gentleman desires.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have seen no information published by the Council of National Defense or in the papers either which gave any accurate information as to what the plans were in reference to aviation. Of course the amount of the estimate was made public. The amount of the appropriation is carried in the bill. I wish it were possible for that to be concealed. With the amount of appropriation carried in the bill, it is inevitable that people will speculate as to what will be done with it, as to how it will be expended, what will be the organization of the Aviation Corps, the number of aviators, the number of machines, the character of the flying machine, and all that. But that will be speculation.

Now, as to the Army, the matters in connection with the Army are fairly well known throughout the world as to all armies. There are two new things in this war among others—in fact, there are many others beside the two—but the two which stand out prominently are, first, the submarine, through which Germany is endeavoring to starve out England, and thereby win the war, and, second, the use of flying machines of some sort for the control of the air. Those are matters of speculation. We know but little about them. If my information is correct, the men at the head on the part of our Government and the allies know but little concerning the submarines of Germany—the number, and, for that matter, the later type, although we see statements in the newspapers from time to time. I can see to-day no way within the near future of starving out Germany. I can see no way in the near future of starving out the allies—England or France. I can see no way for the German Army breaking through the line into France on the west front. I can see no way for the allied army breaking through the German Army on the west front under any existing standards of warfare. But here is an unknown quantity—the use of flying machines. No one knows what can be accomplished by it. No one knows its limitations. No one knows its possibilities. Did you ever buy a pig in a poke and take chances on it? Sometimes it turns out very fortunately; sometimes with the loss of the money invested. And I believe that the time has arrived with our country when we can afford to spend an immense sum of money in trying out the control of the air [applause] and see, first, whether that will give us control of the battle front; second, whether it will strike demoralization and produce revolution in Germany itself. [Applause.]

If I had my way about it, I would pass this bill without saying a word. [Loud applause, and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

There has been no information yet published which will be worth much to the German Army. But every particle of information which is furnished to this House or to this Congress will find its way into the powers that control the organization of the fighting machine of Germany. And I would not give them any information until they learned it in the field. [Loud and prolonged applause, and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to have five minutes. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MANN. Why not read the bill? [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish about 30 minutes to discuss the bill.

Mr. MANN. You can get it under the five-minute debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want it in general debate. I am not going to be swept off my feet. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"].

Mr. DENT. How much time does the gentleman from New York desire?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Thirty minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I want five minutes, if I can secure it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much of the gentleman's hour remains?

Mr. DENT. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MANN. You can dispose of it here. It is a matter of unanimous consent. If you want to close debate you can do it just as well in committee as in the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from New York, as I understand, wishes 30 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] five.

Mr. HULBERT. And I would like to have 15 minutes. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] If gentlemen had read the bill carefully, they would not be so anxious to shout "Vote!"

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SEARS. Can the bill be voted on before it is read to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It can not.

Mr. DENT. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate be closed in an hour and a half, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other half by myself.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, while I have no objection to that agreement, the committee has no right to do that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it has. The committee has the right to provide it by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think it has the right to do that. If nobody objects, it will do it; but there is no rule that permits it to be done.

Mr. MANN. It is true that you can not order it.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent it can be done. Otherwise it could not. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] asks unanimous consent that the debate close in an hour and a half, one half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman and the remaining half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama if I am to get 30 minutes of this time?

Mr. DENT. I intend to use half of the time by giving the gentleman from New York 30 minutes and the gentleman's colleague from New York [Mr. HULBERT] 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there are other matters of importance in connection with this bill to be considered. If Members exercised intelligence in considering the bill they would not so hurriedly insist upon its immediate disposition. For instance, I do not believe that any Member of Congress should be urged hastily, without consideration, to vote for an appropriation plainly in defiance of an express provision of the Constitution of the United States, even to accomplish the purpose of winning the war.

This is not an appropriation bill. The appropriation in the bill is not limited to the fiscal year. It is not affected——

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not wish to be interrupted. I will yield later.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman should not make a statement of that kind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not affected by the provisions of the covering-in act. By the terms of this bill its provisions are in effect for and during the existence of the emergency, and the appropriation is available during the existing emergency; and if the existing emergency continues more than two years, the appropriation of $640,000,000 is in express violation of the constitutional prohibition against appropriations for the support of armies for a longer term than two years. There is another matter in connection with this emergency appropriation to which I wish to call attention.

The War Department asked, not as the law required, in the form of an estimate, but informally and privately through the Committee on Military Affairs, that an appropriation of $639,241,452 be made. The committee reports an appropriation of $640,000,000, an increase of $750,000, without any suggestion of its need. I assume that it is upon the theory that it was desired to make the appropriation in round numbers, just as that committee, when it reported the lump appropriation to carry out the terms of the bill increasing the Army, increased by $100,000,000 the amount requested by the War Department without request, necessity, or justification. To vote three-quarters of a million dollars in excess of the sum stated to be necessary by the service does not tend to economy or careful supervision of expenditure.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate as much as any other Member the importance and the necessity of speedy action in connection with aviation; but if Congress is to follow the practice adopted in the enactment of this bill, which is again suggested by the War Department, of making a lump appropriation for military purposes without any restriction, without any limitation, then the Congress is about to abdicate its functions and to turn over indiscriminately for expenditure vast sums for purposes that Congress would not approve if it had knowledge of them.

A short time ago, in the very large deficiency bill that was enacted, very large sums of money were given for additional employees in the two military departments of the Government. Large sums are required; large increases of force are necessary. After investigation and consideration, because of the impossibility of anticipating exactly the particular number of special positions that would be required, lump appropriations were made.

Yesterday representatives from one of those departments called upon me to inquire what the intention of Congress was and whether a scheme which in results practically increased the compensation of every employee in that department was in harmony with the intention of Congress. I stated that it was not; that the money was to give additional service; it was not the intention to permit the department to make general indiscriminate increases of compensation. A statement was made, which will later be inquired into, that the effect of the practice adopted in one of the departments has been practically to give every employee an increase of compensation out of the funds provided for additional employees. If such a policy is adopted, it is a gross abuse of the discretion given to the department, and it emphasizes the fact that in governmental fiscal matters rigid rules must be adopted that would not be considered necessary in private business. When an enterprise is conducted for profit the interests of those to whom the profits go are a check upon extravagance, which is not present in the Government, and which must be replaced by some other brake.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield? I want to get some information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. What bill does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The emergency deficiency appropriation.

Mr. CARTER. And what particular item was it that the gentleman refers to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The lump-sum appropriations for additional services.

Gentlemen seem to be apprehensive that discussion of this bill will result in information being furnished our enemies which should not be given to them. I have here eight copies of the so-called Official Bulletin, in which the aeroplane program of the Government is discussed in its various phases. The minimum number of planes is stated, the number of students placed in schools of instruction, the location of the great training camps, their acreage, and other information of definite character.

If anybody imagines that the German Government, with its effective organization to get the information that is made public in this country, does not know more than the Members of this House know of what our program is to be as to aeroplanes, then he is living in an atmosphere of delusion from which some day he may awaken. When it was desired to create public sentiment for the program provided in this bill there was no suggestion that information be suppressed; but when legitimate discussion of the bill is proposed here, there is alarm lest the Members mention matters that are stale as news matter.

There are matters in connection with this bill that can be discussed and considered, and that ought to be, without any possibility of conveying information to the German Government, but which will prevent criticism and action that was not anticipated. For instance, I find here on page 11 the committee propose an amendment to strike out of this bill the words:

In the District of Columbia and elsewhere.

The paragraph provides:

For organization, administrative, and contingent expenses, including * * * office rents—

And the like. I have been informed that those words were recommended to be stricken out because some question might be raised as to the jurisdiction of the committee to make appropriations within the District of Columbia; and yet if this particular amendment of the committee be adopted not a dollar out of this $640,000,000 can be expended in the District of Columbia for rent, for clerical services, and for other purposes for which it is absolutely imperative that the money must be expended;

so that it shows either a lack of careful consideration or a lack of information about the statutory provisions affecting the expenditure of public money. The amendment should be rejected by the committee if the money is intended to be used in the District of Columbia; the entire paragraph should be eliminated if the intention is to provide for the departmental services, rent, stationery, and similar matters in the manner usually done.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] stated a moment ago that this amount is entirely outside of estimates heretofore submitted for the military program. Therefore it could not be paid either out of the bond issue of $2,000,000,000 heretofore authorized or out of the revenue bill now under consideration. Can the gentleman state whether it is contemplated that this amount is to be raised by taxation or by an additional bond issue?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know just how the money is to be furnished. It is payable out of the general funds of the Treasury, and Congress must provide the money. It bears out my statement, made when the revenue bill was under consideration, that the amount then proposed would be inadequate to supply all of the needs of the Government in the present fiscal year. This $640,000,000 expenditure was not then contemplated.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was going to say that the gentleman did not contemplate that in his statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was not contemplated, although I knew that as this war progressed and our organization developed necessarily extraordinary sums must be provided that were not then in contemplation. This demonstrates the correctness of my contention.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman from New York yield a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I understood the gentleman to say—I am anxious to get the information, if I am not accurate about it—that under existing law if this appropriation is passed not a dollar of it can be expended for clerical hire or office rent in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not unless the authority is specifically given in the act making the appropriation.

Mr. DENT. The general statute then requires that no money shall be expended for office rent and clerical hire in the District of Columbia unless it is expressly so stated in the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Unless expressly provided, and those words are absolutely essential in the bill if it is intended to utilize the appropriation for these purposes. We ought to know—it would give no information to Germany that would be of any value—what this new organization is to require in the way of office accommodations in the District of Columbia, how much space is contemplated to be obtained, how much is to be paid for this space, and how much ought to be provided. I suppose one of the most troublesome questions to a Member of Congress is the question of providing money for the rent of office buildings in the District of Columbia. It is practically impossible to propose or to consider propositions made for this purpose without resting under grave doubt as to the propriety of the scheme. I do not mean that officers of the Government are improperly exercising their discretion, but I do know that one of the most remunerative businesses in the District of Columbia during my experience here has been the business of renting offices to the Government of the United States, and it has been customary to scrutinize carefully the sums paid, the rates per square foot, and to limit the amounts available for such purposes. Here there is no limit of any kind.

The bill proposes to outline a departmental organization for this new establishment. The War Department for years has been attempting to establish a new grade of clerk in addition to the statutory grades. There are four classes of statutory clerks, and then there are, in addition, the chief clerks and heads of divisions. The War Department has been attempting for years to establish a new grade with a higher compensation, a grade known or designated as that of principal clerk. Members are aware that if we establish a grade of employee in any one department of the Government it necessarily follows that within a very short time every other department of the Government applies for and obtains positions of the same character. It is a scheme designed to provide for the promotion of men already in the service, and Congress has again and again declined to approve the recommendation. I notice that the bill provides in lines 18 to 22, on page 11:

And also for organization, administrative, and contingent expenses, including one chief clerk, seven principal clerks, chiefs of divisions, and such other services as the Secretary of War may deem necessary.

Mr. Chairman, there are some amendments that I propose to submit to the bill, which may or may not meet with the approval of the Committee on Military Affairs. I believe the appropriations should be limited to the present fiscal year, so that the provisions of the so-called covering-in act shall apply to the appropriations. What is known as the covering-in act was passed in 1874. It provides that all appropriations made for a fiscal year shall be available during that fiscal year for payments actually made in it, and to pay during the following two years obligations incurred within the fiscal year.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Does not the gentleman believe that all this money will be necessarily expended before the expiration of the fiscal year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Two years after the expiration of the fiscal year for which the money is appropriated any unexpended balance goes back into the general fund of the Treasury instead of remaining to the credit of the particular fund indefinitely. It is to avoid accumulating large balances, which at some unexpected time are expended by the administration after Congress has long forgotten that the moneys had been appropriated and were available. It may be that this money will all be expended in this fiscal year. If it is not, I believe it should be available only in this fiscal year. For the aeroplane service that is to be cared for after next July the money should be carried in the regular Army appropriation bill for the next fiscal year. We ought not to break down the entire fiscal system of the Government at this time. There is no necessity for it. There is one important function of Government that this House has made a pretense of retaining, and that is the scrutiny and care of the public money. But if we adopt the policy that is demanded by some of the departments of simply turning over in bulk enormous sums of money for expenditure, without limitation, then we abandon our function, and will become a political nonentity. We shall be useful only as a registering machine, simply putting our approval on proposed legislation because the Constitution requires such action. We ought to have some other ambition and accomplish some more valuable service as Members of this House than would be possible if wooden Indians occupied the places we now fill.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that there should be a limitation fixed upon the amount that can be expended in the purchase of land. I do not know how much is contemplated for that purpose, but there should be a limitation in the bill upon that object.

I have never known in all my 18 years' experience in this House a blanket authority to be given to any department of the Government to purchase land that it has not been abused. Officials do not apparently do it intentionally, but it seems inherent in human nature. If authority be given to acquire land without carefully guarded limitations, many purchases are made that would not be suggested to Congress if they were to be passed upon specifically, because it would be known that they could not receive the approval of Congress. As this bill is being considered I shall propose some amendments in the hope of improving it. I do not believe the appropriation should be carried in the bill in the form in which it is. I shall not undertake to strike it out. I believe the War Department should observe the law. The law requires the departments of the Government to transmit through the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress estimates for the public service.

When this bill is enacted and the food-control bill is enacted, Congress will have appropriated more than $800,000,000 for public purposes without an estimate having been submitted in accordance with the law, although the request for the money originated with and was asked for by the administration. When the record is made up the administration will not be charged with having estimated within $800,000,000 of the appropriations and Congress will be charged with having appropriated that money without estimates.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. These estimates are submitted by the various departments to the Secretary of the Treasury before the 1st of October, are they not? This war commenced on the 2d of April.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from California only knows one section of the law. The regular annual estimates must be submitted by the heads of the various departments to the Secretary of the Treasury prior to the 15th of October, and then the law provides for supplemental estimates for services that were not included in the regular estimates. It prohibits the submission of such estimates except under certain designated conditions, and requires a statement to be made of the reasons for the exclusion of the estimates from the regular estimates.

Here is the War Department suggesting a supplemental ap- with having estimated within $800,000,000 of the appropriations ever made in any year up to the present time, ever made for the conduct of the entire department, without a single official request and without any pretense of complying with the law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not the amount appropriated for this Signal Corps service in this bill nearly six times the normal amount of the military appropriation in previous years?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman considered one paragraph, that no man may become a military aviator without having served three years in the service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not discussing that feature of the bill, because I do not profess to be an expert on aerial qualifications. I do know something about the fiscal system of the Government, and that is what I wish to discuss.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I want to ask the gentleman about. Will it not be necessary to revise the revenue bill if this bill passes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. These moneys may come from the proceeds of the bond issues, or an additional revenue bill may be passed. What course will be followed I am unable to tell the gentleman. At present I anticipate that the revenues from the proposed revenue legislation and the authorized bond issue will not be sufficient, in my judgment, to meet the demands upon the Treasury during the present fiscal year.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I want to ask the gentleman a question for information, because the gentleman understands the fiscal system. The gentleman referred recently to the annual estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury and from time to time, under certain restrictions of law, supplemental estimates. Does not the law which provides a limit to the character and kind of the supplemental estimates which may be submitted also contemplate the possibility of war, or was the act drawn for unexpected peace conditions?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The department submits the estimates.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Was it drafted to apply to the unexpected in time of peace, in normal conditions?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the intention was that the money required for the support of the Government, whether for the support of armies or the peace establishment, should be requested from Congress in the form of estimates.

Mr. SHERLEY. And, if the gentleman will permit, there is nothing in the law touching the submission of supplemental estimates which prevents, in time of emergency or any other time, the submitting of estimates, and doing it just as expeditiously as doing it in an informal way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In discussing what should be the policy of the Government in certain particulars, the question of what committee ought to do certain work seems to be of more importance than the effectiveness with which the work is done. I am embarrassed somewhat in the discussion of this question by the fact that I happen to be the head of one of the committees that so many gentlemen seem to imagine is always seeking to add to the troubles they already have. I believe, however, that Congress has not yet awakened to what is going on throughout the world. In all of the nations at war there has been a tremendous change in government. In order to obtain efficiency, in order to accomplish what is to be done, great changes have been made, with a concentration of power. This change has come about everywhere except in the House of Representatives, where we are proceeding in our old, slipshod, illogical, indefensible method of handling the public funds. I have frequently advocated a return to the old system of concentrating appropriations in one committee, and I have heard it said that my attitude in doing so is actuated to some extent by the fact that I happen to be the head of the committee that would get the appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, I am so impressed with the importance of that reform that I am willing, and I am prepared now, if it be necessary to induce the House to adopt the reform, to resign from the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations, with the condition that I shall be inelligible for that position under the new arrangement. [Applause.]

If any one believes that I am selfishly actuated in this matter, he is mistaken. More than that, if the House would bring about the reform, if necessary, to remove any suspicion, if there be such, that my action would be a mere subterfuge, I would agree, if that were desired, to retire from the Committee on Appropriations and not to serve upon it during the balance of my service in the House of Representatives. I do not believe that this work depends upon any particular individual. There is an imperative need for a change, and to accomplish a change of such tremendous importance to the public service I am prepared to eliminate personal considerations so far as I am affected if it will aid in bringing about the reform. It is an indefensible system. Let me illustrate the absurdity of our present system. The Committee on Military Affairs in the first place made an appropriation for aeroplanes in the regular appropriation act for the present fiscal year. Then supplemental estimates were submitted, which were considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and then this very large program is presented, which has been considered by the Military Committee. This program contemplates the utilization of all of the resources of the United States that will be available for the manufacture of aeroplanes. The Navy Department has just submitted a request for $45,000,000 additional for aeroplanes. Some money was provided in the naval act prepared by the Naval Committee; some in the urgent deficiency act prepared by the Committee on Appropriations, and this request will be considered by the Committee on Appropriations. The same committee that made the investigation of the facilities of the United States to produce the planes and carry on the program contemplated in this bill, which has ascertained the facts, ought to consider the request of the Navy Department. The information must be obtained now, either by obtaining what information the Military Committee has already acquired or by going over the same ground. Instead of developing in this House, as we should do, a group of men devoting themselves exclusively to questions of public expenditures, we distribute the power among eight different committees which can not be familiar with the statutes and the provisions and the regulations that affect the expenditure of public money, can not have that comprehensive grasp of the public service required, do not keep divorced from too friendly an interest in particular branches of the public service, and are frequently tortured with petty jealousies and controversies that are detrimental to effective service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. Four years ago I prepared and delivered a speech in the House in which I discussed this question in a comprehensive manner, and suggested some changes in the rules of the House designed to put in one committee control of all appropriations. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing that speech has been exhausted; the 25,000 copies that I had printed of that speech to distribute to those requesting them have been exhausted. I do not believe the matter is subject now to the franking privilege. Recently I have had a number of requests for copies of that speech, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and also to print as a part of my remarks the speech I made upon that previous occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The speech mentioned is as follows:

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the rapid increase in the cost of the Federal Government is attracting universal attention. Many thoughtful men regard our profligate fiscal arrangements as the greatest menace to the permanency of the Union, and the proper solution of the many problems involved is complicated by the good-natured indifference of the people. While a Treasury surplus is maintained by a system of indirect taxation so ingeniously devised that individual burdens are not readily appreciated but are assiduously proclaimed as blessings, it will be difficult to awaken the mass of the people to the importance of the questions involved.

Many attempts have recently been made to stir the country to an interest in the problems. Students of our political system, officials in the executive departments, and Members of the Congress, who have been compelled to deal more particularly with the finances of the Government, have agreed at least in one conclusion—that some radical change is imperatively required in the Federal system if evils of alarming proportions are to be avoided.

In proposing remedies for existing or impending evils much misunderstanding results from lack of knowledge of the present fiscal system of the country and of its growth and development. Much confusion also follows from the indiscriminate use of the term "budget" by many whose conception of the term varies radically and whose "budget" schemes are irreconcilable.

When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, in 1787, the budget, as known to-day in Great Britain, had not been developed and nowhere existed in definite form. Pitt was then working out the system of control upon which the present budget system of Great Britain is based, and at the very time of the adoption of our Constitution he was establishing the consolidated fund, or the general treasury fund, out of which all grants are now made, though with certain priorities established.

WISE FORETHOUGHT OF THE FATHERS.

The framers of the Constitution, with the knowledge then available, provided (Art. I, sec. 9, par. 7) that:

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

This provision was designed to retain in the representatives of the people, or in the legislature, control of the public money and to insure full publicity of all financial transactions in which the Government is involved. They are two essential elements of control of public money in the representatives of the people in every constitutional government whatever form the budget takes.

In order to insure such control of the purse, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House was established in 1789. At first a select committee, in 1802, it was made a standing committee. During the first 76 years of the Government this committee had jurisdiction of all revenue measures and of all the appropriation bills. Until 1844 the appropriations were all carried in one bill, but in 1847 nine separate bills were reported, and from time to time the number has been increased until there are now 13, including the general deficiency bill.

In 1865 a movement was initiated to divide the jurisdiction of the Committee on Ways and Means. Various proposals were submitted, the most alarming among them apparently were those to create a Committee on Banking and Currency and a Committee on Internal Revenue, and to transfer from Ways and Means jurisdiction over the subject matters indicated generally by the titles of the committees.

The various proposals were referred to the Committee on Rules, which reported in favor of the creation of the Committee on Appropriations, to which was given jurisdiction of all the appropriation bills, and a Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was given jurisdiction of banking and currency legislation, and all revenue legislation was left with the Committee on Ways and Means.

Perusal of the debate leads to the conclusion that the arrangement had been worked out to the satisfaction of the Committee on Ways and Means. The report was submitted by Mr. Cox, of Ohio, a Democrat, and one of the minority, and the recommendations were acquiesced in with singular docility by the members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, quit the chairmanship of that committee to become chairman of the new Committee on Appropriations.

No change was made in the jurisdiction of the committees until 1880.

In the year previous the Committee on Rules commenced the most noted revision of the rules of the House in its history. It was an unusually strong committee, consisting of Speaker Randall; Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia; Blackburn, of Kentucky; Garfield, of Ohio; and Frye, of Maine.

EFFORTS TO DISTRIBUTE APPROPRIATION BILLS.

During the consideration of their report in 1880 numerous efforts were made to distribute the appropriation bills among various committees, but with the exception of the agricultural bill and the river and harbor bill all were left with the Committee on Appropriations. The debate discloses that in giving the river and harbor bill to the Committee on Commerce the House had undoubtedly been influenced by the fact that for a number of years the Committee on Commerce, at the request of the Committee on Appropriations, had prepared the river and harbor bill, which, when referred, was immediately referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

In 1885 a new movement was initiated under the leadership of Mr. Morrison, of Illinois, which resulted in the present assignment of appropriation bills, as a result of which eight separate independent committees of the House consider departmental estimates and prepare appropriation bills for the consideration of the House. While such an illogical, unscientific, and universally condemned system prevails attempts at reform will be futile, and an effective remedy for the resulting evils is impossible.

DEMAND FOR A "BUDGET."

The most common demand that has come from recent agitation is for a "budget." I am frequently asked whether I favor a "budget," and my invariable reply is a request to be informed as to what is meant by a "budget." The answers indicate the confusion that prevails even among those most interested as to the meaning of the expression, and the difficulty is not lessened by the fact that plans have been formulated for us from a consideration of the systems in vogue in various countries where the parliamentary or some other responsible government exists, without any careful consideration of the inaptness of such system in our existing institutions.

The Wisconsin State Board of Public Affairs last year issued a very interesting publication entitled "The Budget."

The first essential—

It is stated therein—

in the preparation of any budgetary plan for legislative consideration is the compilation of estimated costs for the fiscal period under consideration. These estimates should, as a rule, be prepared by the administrative departments, because they are versed in the details of their respective offices and familiar with the expenses which may occur in the performance of their duties. * * * An essential element in budgetary consideration involves the formulation of a plan in fiscal affairs. * * * There should be a budget balance—a correlation between estimated revenues and expenditures of the State. These should be exhibited so that their relative amounts may be examined and a comparison made between them. Not only is it necessary to secure a comparison between the total expenditures and revenues, but a comparison should be possible between the various purposes of expenditures, so that it may easily be determined how much it is proposed to grant for one object in comparison with the amount available for another service. * * * As Stourm says, the budget should give not one total but all of the receipts and disbursements, so that a comparison may be easily made at a glance between the various items.

H. C. Adams, in The Science of Finance, insists that the budget should be a comprehensive document picturing the general conditions of the country's finances and at the same time making possible an accurate opinion upon any definite proposal.

He suggests that—

It is necessary that a budget statement begin by an exhibit on a single page of the aggregate or actual receipts and expenditures for the current year, in order that they may be compared with the receipts and expenditures to be provided for by laws yet to be enacted.

He conceives of a budget "so formulated as the principal means by which the administration is held in check and the general policy of government controlled."

It must be remembered that Wisconsin has no budget or any fiscal system whatever worthy of such a characterization.

The practice—

It is stated in the publication mentioned—

of voting appropriations as it exists at present in Wisconsin is lacking in many of these essentials. With respect to the preparation of estimates very little has been done. * * * There has been heretofore no adequate provision for auditing of public accounts. Many of our departments have never been audited at all.

In working out a plan for the State of Wisconsin which "does not involve a budget at all, as that term is frequently used—that is, where the entire expenditures of the State are voted periodically in one bill"—the information to be assembled and submitted to the legislature will contain—

First, a history of the past appropriations, information as to what the appropriation was, the actual cost of each department for the one complete year for each of the various services performed by the department, and the unexpended appropriation.

Second, it will show the request of the departments and the estimates of their needs for the ensuing biennium, will give citations to statutes authorizing payments to be made from the treasury in favor of each department, and the recommendations of the board with respect to the appropriations to be made by the legislature.

DEFINITION OF THE "BUDGET."

In the report of the so-called Commission on Economy and Efficiency made to the President under date of June 19, 1912, under the title "Definition and purpose of the budget," it is said:

As used in this report, the budget is considered as a proposal to be prepared by the administration and submitted to the legislature. The use of a budget would require that there be a complete reversal of procedure of the Government; that the executive branch submit a statement to the legislature which would be its account of stewardship as well as its proposals for the future. A national budget thus prepared and presented would serve the purpose of a prospectus. Its aim would be to present in summary form the facts necessary to shape the policy of the Government as well as to provide financial support. The summaries of fact included in the budget would also serve as a key or index to the details of transactions and of estimates, which would be submitted with the budget or which would be contained in accounting records and reports.

If it be assumed that the essentials of any budgetary plan are accurately stated in these statements, it is difficult to understand the reckless denunciation of the Federal system which its critics so freely voice.

President Taft, in his message of February 26, 1913, said:

The Government is not only in the position of having gone along for a century without a budget, but, what is at this time even more to the point, it has not the organic means either for preparing or for considering one. In the executive branch there is no established agency which may be utilized for assembling the data required for the preparation of budget summaries. The law governing estimates requires that they be prepared and submitted by various heads of departments and independent establishments without executive review or revision. This makes it impossible to submit a budget unless the President does it on his own initiative.

This statement of President Taft epitomizes the criticisms of our present system. I believe such criticisms to be not well founded. No legislation has been more carefully considered nor more effectively worded than the laws regulating the preparation and submission of estimates.

In accordance with the various statutes all annual estimates for the public service must be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury and included in the Book of Estimates. The estimates must be transmitted only through the Secretary of the Treasury, and he is required to have them properly classified, compiled, indexed, and printed. The estimates must be prepared and submitted by the heads of the various departments and other officers required to make estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury on or before the 15th day of October. If they be not so submitted, the Secretary of the Treasury must cause to be prepared in the Treasury Department on or before the 1st day of November estimates for such appropriations as in his judgment shall be requisite in every such case and include them in the Book of Estimates. Estimates, except those for sundry civil expenses, must be prepared and submitted according to the order and arrangement of the appropriation acts for the year preceding, and any changes in such order and arrangement and transfers of salaries for one office or bureau to another office or bureau or the consolidation of offices or bureaus desired by the head of any executive department may be submitted by note in the estimates.

DUTY OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The Secretary of the Treasury is required to rearrange any estimates submitted to him which do not conform to the order and arrangement of the prior appropriation act. All estimates are required to be included in the estimates submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury for insertion in the Book of Estimates, and special or additional estimates for that fiscal year must only be submitted to carry out laws subsequently enacted or when deemed imperatively necessary for the public service by the department in which they shall originate, in which case the special or additional estimate must be accompanied by a full statement of its imperative necessity and reasons for its omission in the annual estimates.

In communicating estimates of expenditures and appropriations to Congress, the heads of departments must specify as nearly as may be convenient the sources from which such estimates are derived, and the calculations upon which they are founded, and must discriminate between such estimates as are conjectural in their character and such as are framed upon actual information and applications from disbursing officers. They must also give references to any law or treaty by which the proposed expenditures are authorized, specifying the date of each and the volume and page of the Statutes at Large, or the Revised Statutes, as the case may be, and the section of the act in which the authority is to be found.

All estimates for the compensation of officers authorized by law to be employed must be founded upon the express provision of law and not upon the authority of executive discretion. If the head of a department, when about to submit the annual estimates, finds that the usual items of such estimates vary materially in amount from the appropriations ordinarily asked for the object named, and especially from the appropriation granted for the same objects for the preceding year, and if new items not theretofore usual are introduced into the estimates for any year, he must accompany the estimates by minute and full explanations of all such variations and new items, showing the reasons and grounds upon which the amounts are required and the different items added.

Not only is the amount believed necessary to be appropriated required to be stated in the estimates, but the Secretary of the Treasury must annex to the estimates a statement of the appropriations for the service of the preceding year which may have been made by former acts. He is also required to submit a statement specifying in detail the number and class of officers and employees of every grade and nature, with the rate of compensation to each, that may in his judgment be necessary to conduct properly the business of collecting the revenue at each port of entry in the United States, together with an estimate of the amounts required for contingent expenses at each of said ports and for such additional expenses of the service as can not be otherwise specifically provided.

REVENUES MUST BE ESTIMATED.

Immediately upon the receipt of the regular annual estimates of appropriations needed for the various branches of the Government the Secretary of the Treasury must estimate as accurately as possible the revenues of the Government for the next ensuing fiscal year, and he is also required, in his annual report to Congress, to prepare and submit estimates of the public revenue and expenditures for the current fiscal year and for the fiscal year next ensuing, together with a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Government for the preceding completed fiscal year.

There are several other requirements, none of which, with one exception, need be recited. The other important provision will be discussed later.

A careful examination of the requirements of the various statutes, stated here almost in haec verba, discloses the minute and detailed information required and obtained by Congress.

If the information transmitted to Congress is inadequate, improperly arranged, misleading, or confusing, responsibility does not rest with Congress. Everyone who is familiar with the history of the enactment of the various statutes compelling the furnishing of the information required by the law knows that it has been a continual struggle on the part of Congress to compel the executive departments to furnish the necessary data to enable the Congress to make proper appropriations, and that there has been ample authority, if the Executive desired to exercise it, to furnish the most complete information possible. Had such an attempt ever been made it would have been welcomed by Congress.

OPINION OF HON. JAMES BRYCE.

Mr. Bryce, in the American Commonwealth, says:

In the United States the Secretary of the Treasury sends annually to Congress a report containing a statement of the national income and expenditure and of the condition of the public debt, together with remarks on the system of taxation and suggestions for its improvement. He also sends what is called his annual letter, inclosing the estimates framed by the various departments of the sums needed for the public services of the United States during the coming year. So far the Secretary is like a European finance minister except that he communicates his statement on paper instead of making his statement and proposals orally. But here the resemblance stops. Whatever remains in the way of financial legislation is done by Congress and its committees, the President having no further hand in the matter, though he may send messages pressing Congress to vote money for some purpose which he deems important.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question, though I do not want to break into the continuity of his argument. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good practice, in order that Members on the floor may know better and get more information of the necessity of making appropriations—taking the river and harbor bill as one illustration and also the public-building bill as another, and possibly the new good-roads bill a little later on—to print upon the bill itself in the form of a footnote, or in whatever form it may take, opposite or below each appropriation, some statement which will show the amount of money already appropriated for that specific object and the purpose of it? I think myself that as far as the river and harbor legislation is concerned it would be an eye opener to many of the Members who have no means of getting knowledge upon the merits of these appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, eliminating certain features of the river and harbor bill and of the public-building bill, all of the information which the gentleman mentions is required to be submitted, and is submitted, in the annual Book of Estimates and is available to every Member if he desires that information.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I prefer not to enter into a general discussion of the matter at this time.

Mr. MANN. We will give the gentleman more time. As to the river and harbor bill, is not all of the information to which the gentleman from Ohio refers contained in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Which every gentleman has the opportunity to examine. If we were to print the same information as a footnote at the bottom of every item in the bill, then the bill would be so long that no more Members would read the bill than evidently read the annual report.

Mr. SHARP. Is it not true that the hearings are not printed upon the river and harbor bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I desire to say that the same information——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has covered what the gentleman from Florida has in mind.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an explanation in this connection, if I may.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The hearings before the River and Harbor Committee are nearly always printed. The gentleman from Ohio is mistaken in that statement. Whenever there is a new project that is not fully reported on in the report of the Chief of Engineers it is fully reported on in a separate document, and in the body of the river and harbor appropriation bill this particular document is referred to by number.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In a note in the revised edition, Mr. Bryce states that the Book of Estimates has become a bulky document, and that the Secretary of the Treasury neither indorses nor criticizes the estimates. He indulges in no caustic denunciation of the inadequacy of the information furnished Congress, nor does he take the same gloomy view of the situation because Congress obtains what has been so freely characterized as "meager," "illy arranged," and "confusing" statements. If such were the fact, this keen observer and frank commentator upon our institutions would not have failed to have noted such glaring defects if they existed.

In 1909 Congress enacted the so-called Smith amendment, section 7 of the sundry civil act, approved March 4, 1909. The provision is as follows:

Immediately upon the receipt of the regular annual estimates of appropriations needed for the various branches of the Government it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to estimate as nearly as may be the revenues of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year, and if the estimates for appropriations, including the estimated amount necessary to meet all continuing and permanent appropriations, shall exceed the estimated revenues the Secretary of the Treasury shall transmit the estimates to Congress as herotofore required by law and at once transmit a detailed statement of all of said estimates to the President, to the end that he may, in giving Congress information of the state of the Union and in recommending to their consideration such measures as he may judge necessary, advise the Congress how in his judgment the estimated appropriations could with least injury to the public service be reduced so as to bring the appropriations within the estimated revenues, or, if such reduction be not in his judgment practicable without undue injury to the public service, that he may recommend to Congress such loans or new taxes as may be necessary to cover the deficiency. (Mar. 4, 1909, Stat. L., vol. 35, p. 1027, sec. 7.)

Whatever may have been said of our system so far as the Executive is concerned, there can be no dispute now as to the extent of the responsibility placed upon the Executive.

OPINION OF H. J. FORD.

In the Cost of Our National Government, Prof. Henry Jones Ford, of Princeton, speaking of this provision, says that Congress has taken—a step toward connection of the powers, and has thus unwittingly started a movement of profound constitutional importance. The real hope of establishing budget control, and with it a genuine constitutional system, lies in the flow of political force in the channels thus opened.

He adds that the action taken by Congress making it the duty of the President to coordinate income and expenditure, as provided in the Smith amendment, "is the salvation of representative government in the United States."

Prof. Ford had in mind the principle of executive responsibility in budget making prevalent in the English system. But, as he points out, it is not peculiar to the English system. In Switzerland, which is a Federal Republic like the United States, the system is even more drastically applied.

If the principle enunciated by Mr. Gladstone be accepted as sound—that the constitutional duty of a legislative chamber is not to augment but to decrease expenditure—the solution of all problems confronting us may readily be solved. A few simple changes in our system will completely establish the system of responsible executive control of our budget, while retaining complete control of the Treasury in the representatives of the people.

To bring about this result two things are necessary—the duty should be imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury to revise the various estimates to be submitted to Congress, and Congress should be deprived of the power to augment any request for money or to originate legislation imposing obligations upon the Treasury. Such is the rule in Great Britain as well as in Switzerland, where this system has been developed to its highest perfection.

These suggestions are radical, but not shots at random. When the Democratic members of the Committee on Rules had been selected for the Sixty-second Congress I proposed a rule prohibiting amendments to appropriation bills which would increase the committee recommendations above the departmental estimates or which proposed appropriations for which no estimates had been submitted. It was a suggestion along lines that reform in the House must eventually follow; but it was not adopted, as the committee was unwilling to recommend a rule that would have deprived the individual Member or the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union of rights enjoyed by committees which prepare appropriation bills. I should have supported such a rule if it extended to the committees, and I am convinced that in time even more radical changes will be imperative, even though the individual Member be deprived of many privileges which he now enjoys.

The oldest standing order of the House of Commons, dating back to 1713, is that—

This House will receive no petition for any sum relating to public service or proceed upon any motion for a grant or charge upon the public revenue * * * unless recommended by the Crown.

FRAMERS OF THE CONFEDERATE CONSTITUTION.

I have heretofore referred to the undeveloped condition of the present-day budget at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The experiences of 74 years of Federal existence was not ignored by the men who framed the Confederate constitution. They were men of affairs and of marked capacity for government, and they included in the constitution of the Confederate States the following provision, which is an enduring tribute to their comprehension of the evils of our system.

In article 1 of section 9 is the following:

Congress is forbidden to appropriate money from the treasury except by a vote of two-thirds of both houses unless it be asked by the head of a department and submitted by the president or be asked for the payment of its own expenses or of claims against the Confederacy declared by a judicial tribunal to be just.

As the time is not ripe even for the consideration of such radical and fundamental changes in our institutions, it is necessary to consider the changes that are advisable as well as possible under the existing order.

Years of investigation have convinced me that one change is essential in the methods of this House preliminary to any other reform. Unless this step be taken all other efforts at reform will be futile. It is necessary to return to the practice of the House during the first 93 years of the Union and to concentrate in one committee control of all of the general appropriation bills. The present method under which the appropriation bills are distributed among eight independent committees of the House is universally condemned by disinterested students of our Government.

OPINIONS OF EMINENT AUTHORITIES.

* * * Before any adequate control is possible—

Says S. Gale Lowrie, author of The Budget—

some method must be devised for the centralized control of all financial measures in a single congressional committee and for the elimination of the promiscuous and irresponsible methods of amending financial bills upon the floor of Congress which now obtains.

Prof. Henry Jones Ford says:

Thus we find in the House of Representatives a budget situation which parallels that which has heretofore existed in the executive branch—a distribution of powers among separate and independent authorities without provision for any unified control coordinating income and expenditure.

An examination of the debates in prior Congresses, when it was proposed to distribute the appropriation bills among a number of committees, is instructive.

In 1865 Mr. Cox, of Ohio, said:

I need not dilate upon the importance of having hereafter one committee to investigate with the nicest heed all matters connected with economy. The tendency of the time is to extravagance in private and public. We require of this new committee their whole labor in the restraint of extravagance and illegal appropriations.

In 1879 Mr. Garfield said:

Let me state that the proposition to divide the Committee on Appropriations to scatter its bills as suggested, and as was once moved, indeed is, in my judgment, although I think it is not pending, an utterly ridiculous proposition. I believe it would cost this Government $20,000,000 if the appropriations were scattered to the several committees. * * * I do say, sir, without the slightest question in my own mind of the truth of the statement, that the scattering of these appropriations as suggested by the gentleman here will be absolutely breaking down all economy and good order and good management of our finances. It can not be otherwise.

While in 1885 Mr. Reed, of Maine, joined with those who combined to scatter the appropriation bills among various committees, yet in 1880, when the same acute political condition did not exist in the House and a revision of its rules was under consideration without partisan alignment, Mr. Reed, in speaking of the abuse that had resulted from the constructions placed upon the Holman rule, said that—a large minority of the House are disposed to break down the work of that committee (Appropriations) and put a portion of it in the hands of several committees, the effect of which will be to add to the expenses of the Government more than this rule (the Holman rule) ever saved.

In the report to the Forty-sixth Congress of the Committee on Rules, the membership of which has been heretofore given, is the following:

* * * It follows as a logical sequence that if any other committee is to take charge of one of the general appropriation bills the interest involved and considered will stand separate and apart from the interests involved and considered in the other bills, and as a further result any scheme of reduction of expenditures made necessary by a deficit of revenue for that fiscal year must be executed by the Committee on Appropriations without respect to the interests involved in the bill so taken from them, thereby leaving that particular interest to stand independent of and without any relation whatever to the other interests for which appropriations are annually made.

JUDGMENT OF SAMUEL J. RANDALL.

Mr. Randall said:

If you undertake to divide all these appropriations and have many committees where there ought to be but one you will enter upon a path of extravagance you can not foresee the length of or the depth of until we find the Treasury of the country bankrupt.

Mr. Whitthorne, of Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Forty-sixth Congress, said:

When I first entered Congress, in the Forty-second Congress, Gen. Coburn, of Indiana, was a member of the Committee on Appropriations. He at that time proposed to divide the labors of that committee as is now proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Shallenberger] and by others. At that time I was heartily in favor of that proposition. But during all these years that I have been here my experience and observation have led me to believe that if we turn loose a half dozen committees upon the subject of appropriations it will be impossible to control the amount of these appropriations. I believe that it is for the interest of the people that the subject of appropriations should be committed mainly to one committee. I say this is not out of any feeling with respect to my own committee, because if I considered that I should be jealous of its rights and should speak jealously of its intelligence and its power of comprehending the duty before it. But, speaking in the interest of the people, in the interest of the Public Treasury, in the interest of the proper control of public expenditures, I may say, what has been forced upon me contrary to my original convictions, that it is the duty of this House to have the subject of appropriations controlled by one committee.

Mr. Robeson, of New Jersey, said:

I do not believe that the various committees to whom is intrusted the legislation of this country should also be interested with the appropriation of money, because this last I hold to be the province of the Appropriations Committee, a committee which not only adds, multiplies, and subtracts, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. Hawley] said yesterday, but a committee which must investigate and take into consideration the results of the action of all committees.

They must examine the work of Congress as a whole. * * * No individual committee which has in hand only the interests of its own business can possibly know what are the results of the work of all the other committees. This is not their province and it is not expected of them. Therefore it is that this Appropriations Committee is necessary. It is a sort of universal solvent that deals with the results of the action of all other organized committees and puts them in a systematic policy for which the party which they represent is responsible.

Mr. Young, of Tennessee, said:

There are, I think, few Members of this House who have had more cause, real or imaginary, of complaint against the Committee on Appropriations than I have had, though I am glad to number every member of it among my personal friends. * * * I know, sir, whenever we relax that rigid grasp which the Appropriations Committee can alone keep on the purse strings of the Government; whenever we wrest from it the key of the National Treasury, we will at once enter upon a vast field of public expenditure that has no bounds and embark upon a turbid ocean of public extravagance which will soon swallow up our entire public resources.

Mr. Simonton, of Tennessee, said:

We have been told that if there was a distribution of the powers and duties of the Appropriations Committee there would not be any increase of the expenditures of the Government. * * * Why must the Committee on Agriculture say what amounts shall be appropriated for the Department of Agriculture, or the Committee on Military Affairs say what amount shall be appropriated for the maintenance or the support of the Army? Is it not because Members are not satisfied with the amounts given by the Appropriations Committee? Now, if the Appropriations Committee should give too much, gentlemen can very easily move amendments to cut down the amount proposed. I have never known an amendment offered to cut down the amount proposed.

Mr. Blackburn, of Kentucky, said:

They (the committees) are appointed that they may guard the interests of the particular department committed to their care. That is the theory of the construction of the committees of the House; and it is a proper theory.

The Committee on Appropriations stands in a very different attitude. Because of no special relation to any department, selected as a fair and impartial arbiter, with no more concern for the Navy or the Army than for the Interior Department or the Post Office Department, it has been selected as the one grand reservoir into which all these proposed disbursements of money should pour, in order that fairly, judiciously, impartially, it may make its recommendations to the House.

Mr. Keifer, of Ohio, said:

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if you transfer to the various committees of this House the duties of preparing the several appropriation bills there will be a strife between those committees, * * * each striving to obtain the most appropriations for the department of the Government directly under its charge, and in that way we will necessarily augment the annual appropriations beyond the ordinary revenues of the Government.

These statements were all made prior to the action of the House in 1885 distributing the appropriation bills to the various committees. The question at times during the same period was discussed at length in the Senate, and such Senators as Beck, Hoar, Edmunds, Sherman, Plumb, Morrill, Bayard, Dawes, Call, and Hale expressed vigorous opposition to the proposition that the appropriation bills should be considered in the Senate by committees other than the Appropriations Committee.

VIEWS OF ABLE SENATORS.

I shall quote from the statements of a few Senators who participated in the debate.

Senator Edmunds said:

I think it would be injurious to the interests of the Treasury and to the interests of the people who supply the Treasury of the United States to send appropriation questions for reports of sums to be appropriated to the various committees that have charge of the classes of the public service about which appropriations must be made, and that the practical result would be, if we divide them up, that the sum total of appropriations would be enormously increased. If there be a standing order of the Senate which says that all appropriations respecting the judicial establishment of the United States should be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, the relations between the Committee on the Judiciary and the Department of Justice and the judicial establishment are of such an intimate and friendly character that we should be quite likely to be acting under a bias and to be more liberal in the money that we would recommend to be expended for the judicial establishment than a body of men not under such a bias would be likely to be. And I confess that I do not see any distinction between the matter of the District of Columbia and any other of the various branches of the public service—the Army, the Navy, Indian affairs, post offices and post roads, public lands, and every one of the scores of separate subjects of public expenditure. I think that we should find in the main that the aggregate of public expenditure would be largely increased, on account of the necessary fact in human nature that committees charged with particular subjects and in direct communication with the particular branches of the public service get to be impressed with the ideas of the special departments with which they have to do, and feel with the departments that the public service would be better promoted with still larger appropriations to carry it on.

Senator Sherman said:

I would not do anything at all to weaken the restraint or power of the Committee on Appropriations. I believe it is necessary, as my friend from Vermont says, to bring all the items of expenditure for the Nation under the eye and control of one committee, so that they may limit the amount of expenditure.

Senator Hale said:

I know from my own experience that the tendency of the mind of a member of either of the other committees calling for appropriations each year—the Military or the Naval Committees—I will speak of the latter because I have had service upon that committee—is to gain all the power in appropriating money possible, and connected with that is the unerring result of desiring to have the power to appropriate more money. There has never been any exception to that. I think few Senators will dispute the statement that if all the business of the Committee on Appropriations was taken from it and given to the several committees we should then be confronted with a general scramble upon the part of each committee for more money. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] urged that point much more forcibly and clearly than I can, and his experience, never a member of the Appropriations Committee, but belonging to other committees here, taught him that.

In 1885 the proposition to distribute the appropriation bills was discussed at great length. It is well established that the success of the proposition was due to two causes.

When the Morrison horizontal reduction tariff bill was before the Forty-eighth Congress Mr. Randall, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, with 40 other Democrats, voted with the Republicans to strike out the enacting clause and thus defeated the bill. Randall and his associates were thereafter referred to by Mr. Morrison as "Randall and his 40 thieves." Mr. Morrison presented the resolution in the Forty-ninth Congress to distribute the appropriation bills, and it was supported by such low-tariff advocates as Springer, of Illinois, Mills and Reagan, of Texas, and Hatch, of Missouri.

FORESIGHT OF JAMES A. GARFIELD.

The other cause was the abuses which had grown up from the constructions placed upon the Holman rule and the proceedings thereunder. With prophetic vision Mr. Garfield predicted six years earlier the inevitable result of the rule as construed and operated.

In an article in the North American Review in 1879 he wrote:

The construction given to this amended rule has resulted in putting a great mass of general legislation upon the appropriation bills and has so overload the committee in charge of them as to render it quite impossible for its members to devote sufficient attention to the details of the legislation proper.

If this rule be continued in force, it will be likely to break down the Committee on Appropriations and disperse the annual bills to several committees, so that the legislation on that subject will not be managed by any one committee nor in accordance with any general comprehensive plan.

It is of the first importance that one strong, intelligent committee should have supervision of the whole work of drafting and putting in shape the bills for the appropriation of public money.

It is to be noted that it was the general legislation placed upon the appropriation bills under the rules which overtaxed the committee, and that there was no contention even upon the part of those favoring the distribution of the bills, that a single committee was overburdened with the matters of appropriation alone.

Among those who opposed the distribution in 1885 were Holman of Indiana, Cannon of Illinois, Herbert of Alabama (afterwards Secretary of the Navy), Blount of Georgia, McMillan of Tennessee, McAdoo of New Jersey, Storm of Pennsylvania, Caswell of Wisconsin, and Phelps of New Jersey.

Through all the debates on the proposition those opposing the distribution insisted that if the plan were adopted it would result in a material and unusual increase in the sums appropriated.

RESULTS OF THE DISTRIBUTION OF MONEY BILLS.

I have had some figures compiled which shed considerable light upon this phase of the question. In the 12-year period from 1901 to 1912, while the bills are prepared by many committees, the total regular appropriations exceeded those for the last 12 years prior to the distribution—that is, from 1875 to 1886—by $6,461,290,923.20, or by 270.8 per cent. Exclusive of pensions, the increase in the total regular appropriations was $5,232,910,707.66, or an increase of 292.5 per cent. Upon the same basis of comparison the population of the United States increased 35,546,750, or 70.9 per cent; the wealth—true valuation of real and personal property—$43,471,214,000, or 80 per cent; farms and farm property, $20,152,995,484, or 190.8 per cent; capitalization of national banks, $319,305,959, or 61.4 per cent; deposits in savings banks, $2,452,293,671, or 237.4 per cent; imports of merchandise, $653,997,764, or 111.9 per cent; exports of merchandise, $1,249,559,929, or 209.5 per cent; domestic exports, $1,232,767,003, or 211.6 per cent; and miles of steam railroad in operation, 123,293, or 117.2 per cent.

The following table gives the per capita values under the same titles for the respective periods ending in 1912 and in 1886:

Per capita values.

	Period ending with 1912.	Period ending with 1886.
Total regular annual appropriations	$103.23	$47.57
Total regular appropriations (except pensions)	81.93	35.67
Wealth	1,234.51	967.79
Farms and farm property	358.40	240.22
Capitalization of national banks	9.80	10.37
Deposits in savings banks	40.66	20.59
Imports of merchandise	14.45	11.65
Exports of merchandise	21.54	11.89
Domestic exports	21.18	11.62

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to give the percentage of the increase in those periods, the latter period over the former, for the Post Office Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I have the information in my committee room. The statement which I have made is based on certain tables I had prepared, and I then asked the Census Bureau to make the calculations so as to show the percentage of the increase in appropriations as compared with the percentages of certain elements that would indicate the growth and development of the country.

Mr. MANN. But I take it the increase in the Post Office Department would be much larger than any increase the percentage of which the gentleman has given, and I think no one has charged that the Post Office Department or the Postal Service has grown simply because there was a Post Office Committee reporting a post-office bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think a good many expenditures have unnecessarily been increased because of that fact. I think that is the experience of the gentleman from Illinois, myself, and many others who have been on this floor.

Careful study of these statistics makes it clear that, considered from any standpoint of the growth and development of the country during the periods mentioned, the increase in expenditures of the Federal Government is out of all proportion to the country's growth.

In an article in the Review of Reviews for September, 1910, Mr. Tawney, a former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, said:

This division of jurisdiction and responsibility in the matter of initiating appropriations has contributed more than any single cause to the enormous increase during the recent years. It was predicted at the time by Mr. Randall and Mr. Cannon that the amendment to the rules dividing the responsibility for appropriations would soon cost the people $50,000,000 annually. Our experience under this rule has demonstrated the wisdom of these men in opposing the adoption and the correctness of their judgment as to its responsibility for greatly increasing appropriations for public expenditures.

Mr. Bryce, in the American Commonwealth, says:

Under the system of congressional finance here described America wastes millions annually. But her wealth is so great, her revenue so elastic, that she is not sensible of the loss. She has the glorious privilege of youth, the privilege of committing errors without suffering from their consequences.

The history of mankind is conclusive that for the excesses of youth a penalty is inevitably exacted.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE RULES.

Convinced that the appropriation bills should all be placed in one committee, I have prepared certain amendments to the rules which, in my opinion, are necessary if such a reform is to be effective.

These amendments are as follows:

Amend Rule X so as to provide that the Committee on Appropriations shall consist of 30 members, including the chairmen of the Committees on Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, the Post Office and Post Roads, Foreign Affairs, Agriculture, and Indian Affairs.

Amend Rule XI, clause 3, so as to read as follows:

3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government, including appropriations for improvement of rivers and harbors authorized by law; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Amend Rule XI, clauses 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, so as to deprive the committees named therein of power to report appropriations.

Amend Rule XXI, clause 2, so as to read as follows:

No appropriations shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order.

Amend clause 8 of Rule XI to read as follows:

8. To the improvement of rivers and harbors, other than appropriations therefor; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Amend clause 12 of Rule XI to read as follows:

12. To the Military Establishment, including the increase or reduction of commissioned officers and enlisted men and their pay and allowances, the militia and the public defense; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Amend clause 13 of Rule XI to read as follows:

13. To the Naval Establishment, including the increase or reduction of commissioned officers and enlisted men and their pay and allowances and the increase of ships or vessels of all classes of the Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Amend Rule XXI by inserting as an additional clause the following:

6. No appropriation shall be reported in any bill other than a general appropriation bill for the support of the Government or be in order as an amendment thereto, and objection to any such bill may be interposed at any time before the consideration thereof has commenced.

Amend clause 6 of Rule XXIII so that it shall read as follows:

The committee may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, close general debate at any time after two hours shall have been consumed therein, and at any time after the five minutes' debate has begun upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph of a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph or, at its election, upon the pending amendments only (which motion shall be decided without debate); but this shall not preclude further amendment to be decided without debate.

Amend clause 9 of Rule XVI so that it shall read as follows:

At any time after the House shall have devoted one hour to the consideration of the unfinished business or business in order in the morning hour, it shall be in order by direction of the appropriate committees to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills: Provided, That during the last two weeks of the session such motions shall be in order at any time after the reading of the Journal.

Amend clause 4 of Rule XXIV by adding thereto the following:

Whenever the call of committees shall have been completed and any bill which requires consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is called up by direction of the appropriate committee, the House shall immediately be resolved in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union if such bill has at any time been considered therein.

Amend Rule XX by adding thereto the following:

2. Any amendment of the Senate to a general appropriation bill which would be obnoxious to the provisions of clause 2 of Rule XXI, if said amendment had originated in the House, shall not be agreed to by the managers on the part of the House unless specific authority to agree to such amendment shall be first given by the House by a separate vote on every such amendment.

[NOTE.—Matter in italics indicates new matter proposed to be added.]

EFFECTS OF PROPOSED CHANGES.

The effects of these changes would be to enlarge the Committee on Appropriations sufficiently to enable its work to be properly done. It would place on that committee the chairmen of the committees which now have annual supply bills, so that they could continue in touch with the respective bills now committed to legislative committees over which they preside. This would largely reintroduce a practice which was followed from the creation of the Committee on Appropriations in 1865 till the end of the Forty-fourth Congress of having as conferees on the respective supply bills two members of the Committee on Appropriations and one member of the legislative committee having jurisdiction of the legislation affected by the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman states a proposed amendment to the rules providing for a membership of 20 for the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Thirty.

Mr. AUSTIN. And the gentleman indicates how the majority of that committee will be increased by the selection of the chairman of these various committees. Now, what provision is made for making an increase in the minority representation on that committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I assume that the same proportion that now prevails will continue, and that the minority will be given one-third of the membership of that committee, which would make the minority have 10 members and the majority 20. At the present time the majority has 14 and the minority 7, and by making this increase of 9 it will take in the 6 chairmen and make provision for 3 minority men.

No legislation of any character could be incorporated in any appropriation bill. This practice seems to be universally condemned in theory, but advocated whenever the proposed legislation is satisfactory to those urging its inclusion in a supply bill.

The House should rigidly enforce the rule, and to eliminate the abuse, if such it be, the rule is proposed prohibiting managers representing the House in conference on any appropriation bill from agreeing to any amendment proposed by the Senate which incorporates new legislation unless authority to do so be specifically given by the House by separate vote upon each proposition.

The question of the naval program could not be determined upon the appropriation bill. The number of officers, men, and vessels of every character would be provided in separate bills reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, as would the increase or reduction of the commissioned officers and enlisted men and their pay and allowances be reserved for separate action by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Appropriations could not be reported in any bill other than a general appropriation bill, and objection could be made at any time before the consideration of the bill commenced.

CONCENTRATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The effect of these amendments would be to concentrate in one committee all questions of appropriations and leave the authorizations with legislative committees to which such authority properly belongs. It would be the logical, scientific, and proper arrangement. The only thing to be determined by the Committee on Appropriations would be the respective sums to be appropriated for various services and purposes within the limits of the authorization fixed by law.

If this method were adopted, the consideration of appropriation bills would be considerably shortened in the House. The various legislative committees of the House would have ample important legislation to occupy their abilities and their time, and it would not lessen their importance nor minimize their influence if the appropriations were not committed to them. Two of the most important committees of the House—the Judiciary Committee and the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee—do not have jurisdiction over the appropriations for the various important services and departments with which they are most closely identified, yet the duties of those committees have not been insignificant nor the legislation enacted on their recommendation been unimportant. In fact, those committees have recommended most of the important legislation enacted for many years.

To insure, however, better opportunity for the consideration of legislation and bills other than revenue and appropriation bills the amendments proposed by me would enable the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to close general debate upon any bill after two hours have been consumed therein and would revitalize the morning hour, so that every day excepting Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, which are now set apart for special business, there should be at least one hour given to business under the call of committees. Relief of some character is necessary; and I believe that with the elimination of legislation from the appropriation bills the changes here proposed would be sufficient.

I am not alone in the belief that the concentration of appropriation bills in one committee is the essential reform for this House.

REMEDY PROPOSED BY JAMES A. TAWNEY.

Mr. Tawney served 18 years in the House, and during the last 6 years of his service was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. In his article in the September number of the Review of Reviews for 1910 he said:

The real remedy for unnecessarily increasing appropriations lies in the adoption of a rule upon the organization of the House in the Sixty-second Congress authorizing the appointment of one committee sufficiently large to represent all sections of the country, vested with exclusive jurisdiction over all estimates for appropriations. This would be a genuine reform in the rules of the House—one that would be of practical benefit to the people. It would save to the Federal Treasury from fifty to seventy-five millions of dollars annually.

Why such a reform was imperative he pointed out by showing that during the preceding session of Congress—Sixty-first Congress, second session—the appropriations reported to the House by the Committee on Appropriations were $16,933,925.24 less than the estimates over which that committee had jurisdiction, while the appropriations reported by all the other appropriating committees were $27,931,402.10 in excess of the estimates.

The reason is not that there is any peculiar virtue possessed by the Committee on Appropriations or the members thereof, but it is because committees dealing with a single department of the Government acquire in time a special bias for the department with which it specially deals.

The reason is well pointed out by Dr. Harlan Updegraff, of the Bureau of Education, in the American School Board Journal for May, 1912, which I have quoted upon a former occasion, and which will bear repetition. In explaining the failure to obtain large appropriations for the Bureau of Education he wrote as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEDURE A HINDRANCE.

If, during the past 40 years, the Commissioner of Education had been granted lump-sum appropriations from which he could have paid salaries fairly commensurate with those paid by local public and private agencies throughout the United States, and had it been possible for him to set aside proper amounts for traveling expenses, the bureau would have made a far greater impress upon educational policy and practice. In consequence of the higher appreciation which would have resulted, it is also quite probable that the Congress would have increased its appropriations from year to year until their magnitude would have become more nearly commensurate with the high regard in which all Americans hold their public schools.

However, there is an underlying cause for this situation in the business procedure of each of the two Houses of Congress. Under this procedure the estimates for some departments are acted upon by their friends at court, while the estimates for other departments are passed on by a tribunal whose main object is economy. All appropriation bills for the Department of Agriculture are prepared in the House Committee on Agriculture, and are reviewed in the Senate by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. This same practice also holds with the appropriations for the Diplomatic Service, the military service, the naval service, and the postal service. On the other hand, the appropriations for the other branches of the executive departments are prepared by the Committee on Appropriations of the House and are referred in the Senate to its committee of like name. Quite naturally the attitude of these Committees on Appropriations toward the estimates submitted by their respective branches of the executive department is distinctly different from that shown by the committees which recommend the appropriations for a single department or bureau. Members of the latter class of committees have their attention centered on one particular set of governmental activities, which they hold in growing appreciation as their knowledge of the work increases. On the other hand, members of the Committees on Appropriations have their attention divided among several departments and independent offices and commissions, all of which are more or less desirous of increased funds. Strong attachment to the work of any branch of the Government service is not fostered by such a condition. Moreover, the numerous insistent demands that come upon them develop a controlling idea in the minds of these Appropriations Committees—not the great good that may come to the people through any branch of the service, but rather the desirability of cutting appropriations to the lowest possible limit in order that the party in power will not be held accountable for large expenditures. In brief, all the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, and the principal appropriations for the War, Navy, and Post Office Departments, are in the hands of their friends, while those of the remaining Government offices must come before a tribunal the chief aim of which is to keep the total appropriations, including those framed by the special committees, within certain fixed limits. It follows from this that the liberal appropriations recommended by the special committees have a tendency to lower the appropriations for the other departments, which are drawn directly by the Appropriations Committees. Had the estimates of the Commissioner of Education during the past 40 years been referred in the House to the Committee on Education and in the Senate to the Committee on Education and Labor there would undoubtedly be to-day a far different story to tell. If such a reform in the procedure of the Houses could be carried out to-day, an increased participation of the National Government in the educational development of the country would probably result.

After six years' service at the head of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Tawney retired from Congress on March 4, 1911. On that day he made his last statement to the House, and reviewed in a comprehensive manner the expenditures of the Government. He entitled his speech "Review of the money bills, with suggestions and reflections thereon, based on six years' personal experience in their preparation."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may have leave to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to the House. I think I shall take about 15 or 20 minutes to complete what I have to say.

In the course of that statement, the last to be uttered by him in the House of which he had been so distinguished a Member, he said:

Mr. Speaker, to my mind no other reform in the rules and procedure of this House is so essential to the future welfare of the people and to the economical appropriation and expenditure of their money for the public service as the consolidation of the appropriating jurisdiction of the House under a single committee of sufficient size to be representative of all sections of the country and of every branch of the public service. * * * This division of responsibility over the aggregate of the appropriations between eight committees of the House has year by year since its adoption * * * in 1885 resulted in an abnormal growth of public expenditures. As I have said before, ours is the only Government on earth which tolerates such a system of divided responsibility, the only Government which has established and maintains such a system of utter irresponsibility with reference to the initiation of authority for drawing drafts upon the Public Treasury for public expenditures. This system, too, has begotten extravagance and a wide difference in the manner of authorized expenditures between the respective branches of the public service, a difference which is actually grotesque in its inequalities.

EXPERIENCE OF JOSEPH G. CANNON.

Mr. CANNON ended 38 years' service in this House on the 4th of March last. He was in the Forty-sixth and Forty-ninth Congresses, when it was proposed to distribute the appropriation bills to various committees. He opposed the suggestion on both occasions. On March 4, 1913, about to quit the scene of his many years of activity, he made his final speech to the House. Speaking of the distribution of appropriation bills in 1885 he said:

Mr. Speaker, that change, in my judgment, based upon intimate knowledge and observation, has cost this country many, many millions of dollars in needless appropriations and expenditures. * * * No matter what the stress of circumstances may bring about in our national life now or hereafter, or how necessary it may become to apply the pruning knife, it can never be done without harsh and inequitable results through the medium of many committees as now provided under our House rules.

I speak with deep and firm conviction in these premises, and after many years of somewhat arduous labor as a member of the Committee on Appropriations when it controlled all of the bills, both under Democratic and Republican Houses, and as its chairman when it controlled only a portion of the bills, and as a member of it under Democratic Houses under like conditions.

SIMILAR VIEWS BY JOSEPH D. SAYERS.

A short time ago it was suggested that I write to former Gov. Sayers, of Texas, and request his photograph to add to the collection possessed by the Committee on Appropriations of its former chairmen.

Gov. Sayers answered my request, and I take the liberty of reading his letter to me:

APRIL 21, 1913.

Complying with your request, I will on to-morrow express, charges prepaid, to Mr. Courts my photograph framed.

My best wishes are for you, politically and personally.

Having served on your committee for 12 years continuously, I am always much interested in its doings, and have indulged the hope that it would be again charged with all the appropriations of whatever character. Until this shall have been done, it can not be reasonably expected to accomplish much in the direction of economy—an ancient watchword of the Democratic Party.

Gov. Sayers is personally known to few Members of this House other than the members of the Texas delegation. He served 12 years in the House, and was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the Fifty-third Congress, leaving that committee and his service in this body to become the chief executive of his State. On the committee with him were such well-known men as Holman, of Indiana, and Dockery, of Missouri, later governor of Missouri for two terms and recently appointed Third Assistant Postmaster General. The most significant thing about this statement, volunteered without any suggestion, is that Gov. Sayers in 1885 voted to take some of the supply bills from the Committee on Appropriations.

The opinions of men of the capacity and standing of those whom I have quoted, as well as my own experience, observation, and study, have led me to the conclusions which I have stated to the House.

It is said, however, that this reform is impossible of attainment. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], in his speech of February 28, 1913, stated the objection usually advanced. He said:

I do not for a moment believe that the members of these other committees will ever consent to give up their power over the details of these supply bills.

It may be that the House will not adopt the reform suggested, but I am unable to believe that Members of the House will vote to retain control of appropriations in committees of which they are members for that reason alone.

In my opinion this House will endeavor to do what is right and best for the public service and for the country and will not approach the consideration of the question with an unalterably fixed intention to vote against the proposed reform merely because of membership on certain committees which now have jurisdiction of certain appropriations as well as of legislation affecting the departments for which they appropriate. If it could be demonstrated, which I do not believe possible, that such is the attitude of all of the members of such committees, then I should remind the House that they constitute a minority of 147 in a membership of 435, and that they have not the power in themselves to prevent the House from effecting this reform if upon full consideration it is believed to be the one required.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES.

The only alternative to the plan here suggested that has been proposed is contained in the resolution offered in the last Congress by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] to create a committee on estimates and expenditures, to consist of certain members of the Ways and Means and Appropriations and the chairman and one other member of the committees having jurisdiction of the annual appropriation bills. This proposed committee is to report the available revenue for the next ensuing year and to apportion to the respective committees that part of the revenue that may be distributed by it in the respective supply bills.

I do not favor such a committee, because I do not believe it either practical or that it can be effective in its operations.

Such a committee was created in the Senate in March, 1909. It had 20 members, including the chairmen of the Committees on Appropriations, Finance, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Post Offices, Agriculture, and Indian Affairs. The composition was very much as proposed in the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky. The heads of all the spending committees were brought together for the purpose of coordinating their action. Prof. Henry Jones Ford, speaking of this committee in the fall of 1909, said:

All that the movement amounts to is the creation of a new committee subject to the same conditions of action as the old committees, and there can be no sensible expectation of much better results.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, is it not true that the Senate committee had absolutely no power——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am going to call attention to what I state is a very emphatic and significant difference.

His observation was accurate; the committee made one report setting forth certain well-known truths affecting the Government's business and expenditures and accomplished nothing.

The proposal of the gentleman from Kentucky differs essentially from the Senate scheme in one important respect. It is this very difference which, in my opinion, makes the plan impracticable.

Before any committee having jurisdiction of an appropriation bill can do its work the proposed committee on estimates and expenditures must report a resolution, which must be acted upon by the House, defining the sum that the appropriation bills may carry. I express the opinion, based upon 14 years' service in this House, all of the time upon committees which have had jurisdiction of appropriation bills, and during 8 of the years upon the Committee on Appropriations, that no one, and no committee, at the outset of any session of Congress, without careful investigation involving extensive hearings, can even approximate what the annual supply bills should carry. If this proposed committee is to have hearings upon the proposal to distribute the revenue, then it will determine all of the important questions to be solved by the committees making up the bills and leave to those committees merely the routine and drudgery to do.

ERRONEOUS PRINCIPLES INVOLVED.

The scheme, in my opinion, is based upon an erroneous principle. Under our system our revenue is not adjusted annually in accordance with our expenditures.

Tariff legislation enacted by the Republican Party has not had as its primary function the obtaining of revenue, but rather has been designed chiefly to protect American manufacturers.

With the exception of a comparatively few years, the revenues have been in excess of the expenditures since the Civil War. With such a plan in operation, I believe that the appropriations would have been augmented instead of lessened, because the constant tendency of the legislature is to absorb all of the revenues in advancing projects in which the Members are interested.

The one thing above all others that made specie payments possible was the rigid economy enforced by a Democratic House of Representatives. It also made possible the casting off of the burdens of the taxes resulting from the war.

Should the plan proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky be adopted, what will prevent the House from increasing bills reported by the committees within the limitation beyond the amounts determined upon by the report of the Committee on Estimates and Expenditures? There are few of the appropriation bills that can not be so framed within certain limits as to insure their increase upon consideration by the House.

Another fatal defect to the plan is the failure to take into consideration the action of the Senate. All writers upon our system emphasize the fact that the necessity of submitting the supply bills to two bodies with equal powers to augment them is the most perplexing difficulty to be met, and yet, after all the consideration and determination of the House, the Senate would be free to exercise unrestrainedly its right of amendment.

VIEWS OF PRESIDENT WILSON.

President Wilson, in his Congressional Government, speaking of the situation, says:

But unfortunately the dealings of the Senate with money bills generally render worthless the painstaking action of the House. The Senate has been established by precedent in the very fullest possible privileges of amendment as regards these bills no less than as regards all others. * * * The upper House may add to them what it pleases, may go altogether outside of their original features of legislation, altering not only the amounts but even the objects of expenditure, and making out of the materials sent them by the popular chamber measures of an almost totally new character. As passed by the House of Representatives, appropriation bills generally provide for an expenditure considerably less than that called for by the estimates; as returned from the Senate they usually propose grants of many additional millions, having been brought by that less sensitive body up almost, if not quite, to the figures of the estimates.

The gentleman from Kentucky admitted that this was a weakness in the plan proposed by him, but expressed the belief that the focusing of public attention upon the consideration of the committee's report would stop most of the abuses that now exist. I am unable to share in this belief. In my opinion both the Senate and the public would have long forgotten what had been said and done in the House before the supply bills were acted upon in the Senate.

From 1901 to 1912 the Senate increased the appropriation bills, exclusive of pensions, by $304,314,167.73. In 1908, exclusive of pensions, the increases amounted to $44,944,465.31; and in 1909, the increase made by that body to annual supply bills, except pensions, as passed by the House, aggregated $66,146,443.38, which resulted in the abortive attempt to check the increase of appropriations by the creation of the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Instead of checking the tendency of the Senate to increase bills, in my opinion, it will compel the Senate to amend even more freely than at present.

This result will be more marked when the Houses are in different political control.

There is a political objection to the plan, which, while it should not be controlling, nevertheless should not be ignored.

Let it be assumed that such a committee is in existence; that it has reported resolutions to the House fixing the limits of various bills; that such resolutions have been agreed to by the House; and that the supply bills pass within the limitations fixed. If at the end of the session the appropriations, when finally agreed upon, exceed the sums stated in the resolutions agreed to upon the report of the proposed committee, then the party in power has written a most conclusive indictment of its incompetency. The opposition need only to exhibit the resolutions as showing the promise and the total of the appropriation as showing the performance.

WEAKNESS OF THE "BUDGET COMMITTEE" PLAN.

In a short session of Congress the plan can not possibly work. At the last session I had the subcommittee in charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial bill meet before Congress convened. With considerable difficulty advance proofs of the estimates were obtained in confidence from the Treasury Department, so that it was possible to report and pass that bill within the first 10 days of the session. It is always important, in the short session, to send to the Senate at least two of the appropriation bills before the holiday recess. If the committee had to wait upon the proposed committee to complete its investigations and deliberations, and the action of the House upon its report, the appropriation bills, in my opinion, would either fail or be passed under a procedure defensible only under extraordinary circumstances by the suspension of the rules. This would preclude amendment and debate, and would make the committees the real legislative authority.

It is said that the defects of this plan are common to the one which I have advanced; that the Appropriations Committee would prepare its bills in subcommittees for the consideration of the full committee and, in effect, there would be separate and independent committees in charge of the respective bills. I deny the accuracy of the contention. The experience of the House does not justify the claim. The routine portions of all bills, the matters fixed by law about which there is no discretion, would be adjusted by the subcommittee and ignored by the full committee; but the important questions in every bill involving policies, in so far as they might be determined by the sums appropriated to conduct a particular service, would be determined by the entire committee. In reaching a conclusion upon all such matters the various members would have in mind the different projects and services for which provision must be made in other bills, and thus would always be acting with a wide vision and more clear comprehension of the entire governmental business.

Moreover, a policy could be tacitly agreed upon and carried out by the committee. It was done so in the last Congress, but every plan to effect economies was rendered futile by different policies in other committees.

With the creation of the proposed committee the differences continually arising from conflicts over jurisdiction and inevitably resulting either in unnecessary appropriations or ill-advised legislation would not be eliminated. The situation is well illustrated by the condition of the Indian appropriation bill to-day. Senate amendments to that bill provide lump-sum appropriations for additional clerical services in the Indian Bureau in Washington, although ample provision has been made for the clerical force of the bureau in the legislative bill, and it is even proposed to repeal a statute which requires detailed estimates of the number of persons required in the bureau to be submitted to Congress for consideration. Such conditions rarely arise affecting bills in the Committee on Appropriations, and when they do it is much easier to prevent the supplemental appropriations in the manner mentioned.

Should the proposed committee be appointed, I believe it will have a tendency—which should be resisted—to include all appropriations in a single bill. Compelled to investigate and to hold hearings, in time the inevitable result would be more extensive hearings and investigations, until practically all of the functions of the eight committees having jurisdiction of the appropriation bills, so far as appropriations are concerned, would be absorbed. This would give impetus to such a movement to include all the appropriations in a single bill, and to do so would require the rearrangement of many items which would remove many of the most salutary checks upon expenditures found in our statutes.

I shall not discuss at length this phase of the question. It will suffice to quote very briefly from a competent and disinterested authority. The Wisconsin Idea, published in 1912, was written by Mr. Charles McCarthy, chief of the Wisconsin legislative reference department. In the introduction to the book, written by Col. Roosevelt, it is said:

This book is a book which in my judgment every reformer just at this time should have in hand.

In the preface, Mr. McCarthy says:

Because of my duties as librarian of the legislative reference department and as a member of the faculty of the University of Wisconsin, I can say truly that I have had opportunities to see events in this State from a different standpoint than any other man.

STUPIDITY OF POLITICAL ECONOMISTS.

Occupying such a position with the encumium already quoted upon the work, I desire to quote briefly from it.

In the opinion of the writer—

Says Mr. McCarthy—

Winconsin has been fortunate, on the whole, in not having what is known as a "budget bill." Trained as a student of economics it was rather difficult for him to reach this conclusion, but a thorough investigation of the procedure in other States and some first-hand knowledge of such procedure in foreign countries have convinced him of the wisdom of this plan. * * * The budget bill—meaning one inclusive bill containing all appropriations—belongs in a responsible cabinet government, and not in a government such as ours. A cabinet government may present its estimates and recommend expenditures and permit the legislative body to fight over them within limits, but the administration as a result of its acceptance or rejection stands or falls, consequently the party member is whipped into line and supports those who make the estimate, unless the protest from public opinion is so great that he dare not do so. If he does not stand by those estimates his party goes out of power and a new administration comes in to make a more acceptable and popular budget. That American States have adopted the budget bill stands as a monument to the stupidity of political economists who have recommended it to American legislatures in the past.

Mr. Speaker, it is natural that there should be differences of opinion as to what improvements, if any, can be made in our present system. Able men differ radically with me in the remedy I urge. To them I concede the utmost honesty and sincerity of purpose. It would be strange, indeed, if everyone were in agreement as to the changes necessary in our procedure.

CONCENTRATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS JUSTIFIED BY LONG EXPERIENCE.

I suggest nothing novel, untried, or experimental. The changes here urged are those which withstood the assaults and vicissitudes of 93 years of our existence. It has the approval and indorsement of many men who towered as giants among their contemporaries and whose fame is not as flickering as the feeble candle's light, but steady and resplendent as the noonday sun.

The questions involved will require the exercise by the House of its highest talents and most discriminating judgment, and I know that whatever is done will be with the patriotic determination to act only for the best interests of the people and of the country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I believe I but express the spirit of the entire membership of the House when I say that I am heartily in favor of the purposes of this bill. The applause during the debate which has been had, which greeted the statements approving the program, indicates a practical unanimity in thought and feeling upon the part of the membership of the House in respect to the aims and objects of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] well stated the situation that is in the minds of earnest, thoughtful, and patriotic American citizens to-day. How can we best contribute America's strength and power to bring an early termination to the war? He has very clearly and properly pointed out a manifest opportunity that is America's opportunity, and I would not for one, nor do I believe any Member of this House would, seek to delay the passage of the bill. However, when the gentleman from Illinois says that he would vote for it with his eyes shut and without a word of discussion or a change in the bill, it leads me to believe that he has not read the bill because that statement is completely at variance with the gentleman's whole conduct in the House. I myself am perfectly willing to vote with my eyes shut upon a matter of military importance, as well as any other Member of the House, if circumstances make such a course advisable, but this is a new departure in a new field. We are about to travel along a path upon which our feet have never heretofore moved.

We are entering into the field of aviation, one of the new and most scientific fields of modern times. Our preparation to date is grossly inadequate, as everybody knows. The type of aeroplanes which we have thus far developed is not suited for the supreme tests of the European battle fields. We have got to learn to build anew engines and planes. We have got to build anew an organization; we have got to build anew and equip what you might call places for training, cantonments, and things of that kind. It may be, and properly, that most of this should be closed to discussion. I have no desire whatever to discuss them. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that when a bill covering such a new field is brought to us to approve without much, if any, debate, and perhaps without much, if any, in the way of amendment, we ought to know that it has been subjected to the acid test. We ought to know that it comes here with the unqualified indorsement of the best military thought in our Nation. We ought to know that it has the indorsement and the approval not respecting plan alone, but detail as well, of the War College of the Nation and the General Staff. Decidedly it has not so come. I am willing readily to concede that it may be that the General Staff and the War College would approve of most of the details of the bill—perhaps all of them—but it is very probable that there would be some changes, and there might be some important changes. Without adverting to the two or three items which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has just called attention to, I want to invite the attention of the committee to two others that I think ought to be discussed under the five-minute rule.

It may be they are all right; if they are, let us leave them in and vote for them, but I have the right to know, I being informed no enemy of the United States will receive any consolation, comfort, or information of value. The first is: Is it preferable, as is provided in the second section of the bill that the officers who are to be commissioned in this corps shall be commissioned by the President, up to the rank of colonel, without the advice and consent of the Senate?

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Under the national-defense act the number of officers up to the rank of colonel are now commissioned without the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand that; but we are departing into a new field and getting officers who have never been tried before, whose proficiency has not been demonstrated. I am perfectly willing to concede that this method is proper, but I have a right to have some information on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman desire more time to conclude? I will yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, the other feature of the bill may be all right, but it attracted my attention. It is a purely detail provision of the bill. On page 9, where provision is made for vocational instruction——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is in the national-defense act.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Oh, I understand that in reference to the national-defense act; but you can not tell me, and tell it in a way you think I would believe it, that there is going to be vocational education for these million men we have drafted and are going to send to France. Of course not; they can not do it. Military efficiency comes first. I do not know to what extent it is believed the vocational training will be carried on among these boys who are to be drafted or enlisted in the Aviation Service, and I have a desire to know.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I suggest that there are about 10 machinists to each machine, and it is expected, incidently to the work on these machines, they will be taught how to work.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is proper—nobody can question that—but this says, "and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations." That would enable a whole course of industrial training to be given, having no relation to military duties.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That follows the phraseology of the national-defense act.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How much of the $640,000,000 is supposed to be utilized in that way is a very pertinent inquiry, and I think we could have some discussion further on that without developing any secrets for the enemy. The national-defense act was passed in and largely for a time of peace. We are now at war. This bill relates to a war period only. Its provisions should therefore be confined to war conditions.

Mr. KAHN. Under the five-minute rule, there will be opportunity for discussion.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am delighted to find the gentleman generous, as he always is equally generous in this regard; and yet the gentleman from Illinois would have us take it without even looking at the title.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman will find that in the national-defense act.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word about the section of the bill which makes an appropriation of $640,000,000. I believe nobody has been more opposed to lump-sum appropriations than I have. Perhaps nobody is more jealous of the prerogatives of his own committee than I, and this violates both of those tendencies of mine, and yet I am going to vote for the proposition. I acquiesce in it not because I think it is right, and not because I am so very much impressed with the arguments that we must not reveal anything to the enemy, because after all the discussion there has been in the press and with this enormous appropriation we are telling pretty much to the enemy what we are going to do, we are putting him on notice; but the reason I am going to vote for it is because I believe that our best chance of speedy success is to promote actively our aeroplane development, and the Military Affairs Committee has given this full consideration, and it is extremely important, I think, that this should immediately be passed, and therefore I waive my objections on those scores; but I can not waive them without saying a few words about it. In the first place there is no question that this is an infringement by the Committee on Military Affairs on the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations.

If this estimate had been sent in it would have gone necessarily to the Appropriations Committee, and without claiming for a moment that the Appropriations Committee is any better qualified to deal with it than the Committee on Military Affairs, still we all like to keep the jurisdiction of our own committees. The only reason this appropriation is not now before the Appropriations Committee is that the War Department in defiance of the law sent in no estimate but privately asked the Military Committee for it. And without censuring at all or criticizing the Military Committee, because they took what was given to them, I do feel like censuring the War Department.

The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] inquired for the law. Here it is:

Hereafter all estimates of appropriations and estimates of deficiencies in appropriations intended for the consideration and seeking the action of any of the committees of Congress, shall be transmitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury and in no other manner.

This appropriation has never been transmitted to Congress in any way except in the secret conferences of the Military Committee. The only way the War Department has given this to Congress has been in violation of law and not through the channel which the law prescribes. I think that is subject to censure. If it had been sent in through the regular channel, if the law had been complied with, and the Secretary of War had sent in this estimate, instead of going to the Military Committee it would have gone to the Appropriations Committee. Of course, the Secretary of War knew that. Whether that was the reason and the motive for violating the law I will not undertake to say. But the Secretary of War has not only here, but heretofore, ignored that law, and we all know that the heads of the departments like to have their bills treated by their committees, and naturally, perhaps. I am not surprised that they should. But although in this case I feel compelled, because of the emergency, to acquiesce in the result, yet I do not wish by silence to have it appear that we did not observe the failure of the Secretary of War to conform to the law; that we do not condemn such action; and that we do not suspect the motive. And it is irritating to feel that the public exigency prevents treating such conduct as it deserves. And I feel somewhat resentful of such a slight, whether intentional or not, of the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee.

Then as to the claim that is made that this is so confidential and secret that for that reason it should not be debated and the estimate brought out, I think that is exaggerated, and I can not avoid the impression that it is urged to excuse the usurpation of the Military Committee. The Secretary of War himself, as the chairman of the committee, has shown by the bulletins which he read, published to the world the purposes and many of the details of this appropriation. And it seems to be rather contradictory to first publish bulletins of information and then to protest against debate in Congress of that very information. These bulletins of information which the different departments are so assiduously using to advertise themselves are of very questionable legality.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, while I believe that this bill should be amended in some particulars, I shall vote for it whether it is amended or not, for I believe that it is one of the most important bills that we have had before us for consideration, presenting a program that may enable us to more speedily win this war. And I am also in full agreement with the sentiments that have been expressed, that in the discussion of this bill there should be no discussion that would give any information to Germany that might be helpful to her. But I was amazed at the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] when he said that, if he could have his way, this bill would pass without one single word of discussion. And that statement, I am sorry to say, met with very enthusiastic applause by this House.

Mr. Chairman, when statements of that kind are made and applauded, as they were, is it any wonder that the House of Representatives is rapidly losing the respect of the country, and that it is looking upon us as being a mere "rubber stamp"? We have no right to shirk or surrender our constitutional duties in considering bills to the fullest extent, so far as we can do so without aiding our enemy in this war. And there are provisions in this bill that have nothing to do with furnishing any information to Germany, and that ought to have the fullest consideration; and this House, if it shall go upon the theory that because this bill is reported from the committee, that they will shut their eyes and vote for everything that is in it without consideration, simply confirms the opinion that the country is coming to have of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. For a question.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it not one of the best safeguards the department itself can have, to have reasonable discussion of the provisions of the bill upon the floor?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, certainly. And if the theory that we are to pass bills without discussion shall prevail, we are inviting the departments to put things in the bills that never ought to be there, and would not be there if they knew they were going to receive proper consideration by this House.

Now, I can not in five minutes' of debate refer to what I have in mind, as I shall later on. I shall only refer to section 9, a section which gives unlimited power to the department, not only over the condemnation of land, as pointed out by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], but building wharves and dredging rivers and harbors and many other things. There is scarcely anything in there that you can conceive of that the department might not at any time want to do, that full authority is not given it to do. During the existence of this war, perhaps, all that is necessary, but section 9 is not limited to the duration of this war. That section is permanent legislation, and when this war shall cease the authority of the War Department will remain to condemn land wherever it sees fit to condemn land, to build wharves wherever it sees fit to build wharves, to dredge channels wherever it sees fit to dredge channels, so far as obligating the Government is concerned.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. Respecting the criticism of the bill that the gentleman has just made, does not the gentleman think, without any extended debate here or exploitation of the purposes of it, the objecting Member should go to the chairman of the committee and suggest his amendment and, if thought proper, that it could be adopted immediately? Does not the gentleman think that would be the best way without opening up unlimited discussion?

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think that my calling attention to section 9, to powers that concern not only the duration of the war, but after the war, is furnishing information to the enemy?

Mr. ELSTON. I do not believe that, but I believe the example of sober-minded Members in discussing and criticizing the bill on points which could just as well be submitted to the committee and have adopted, will lead to wider discussion.

Mr. LENROOT. On that, if I was a member of the committee, I could have suggested some of them to the committee, but I happen not to be a member, and I have taken the first opportunity to suggest a reasonable amendment that I think ought to be adopted. I am afraid the temper of this House is such that, although it is clear that section 9 and perhaps other sections should be limited to the duration of war, I very much fear that it will not be. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I hardly agree with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the ranking member of the committee that this bill should have gone under the rules to the Committee on Appropriations. The estimate is made, and properly made, in my judgment, by the Secretary of War directly to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the manner in which that is made, in my judgment, is entirely immaterial.

The committee will notice that this act is for the increasing and strengthening of the Signal Corps of the Army, including the Aviation Service. Gentlemen will also notice that section 4 of the bill prescribes how the personnel shall be organized, in a number of divisions, brigades, wings, squadrons, and so forth, all of which comes directly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs, and is not properly under or for the consideration of the Committee on Appropriations.

However, I do not criticize the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and its ranking member for calling attention and protesting, whenever they are offered, against lump-sum appropriations. Those protests ought to be made. The only question for us is to determine whether or not this is a sufficient exception, under the exigencies of the emergency, for us to say that the ordinary rule that lump-sum appropriations ought to be condemned shall apply in this case. In my judgment this committee and the House of Representatives will be entirely justified in this case in saying that this is one of the occasions when an exception can properly be made. I think that when the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the membership of the Committee on Military Affairs unanimously agree upon the recommendation of this bill, with this form of an appropriation, and, when they say to the committee and to the House that the reason is for military purposes only, because the discussion of the itemized provisions of this appropriation would necessarily convey information to the enemy that would be deleterious to the interests of this country in the war, I think that is sufficient justification for the House to say now that it will consider it in the form in which it is presented.

I do not think that by any means eliminates, or was intended to eliminate, the discussion of the general features of this bill. These various provisions of the bill that are set out here at length are already given to the public. It is perfectly proper for the committee to discuss them. The only thing that is asked is that all of the various items making up this lump-sum appropriation shall not be set out and discussed publicly before the world.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman understands that the committee has those items of the amounts and has considered them?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I understand that. The statement was made by the chairman of the committee that all of the items were set out particularly before the committee and gone over and considered by the committee, and they say they believe it would be unfortunate and probably dangerous to the interests of the country in the war if they were made public, and that is sufficient for me. When matters such as these, regarding things that may be of benefit to the enemy, should be withheld, I am ready to say that I am willing to acquiesce in the judgment of the committee and ready to emphasize the duty of Congress whenever it is called upon by silence, if necessary, to strengthen the power of the Government in this emergency. I am as much in favor of publicity as any man, but we must recognize at this time that publicity generally regarding the operations of the Army and Navy can not be had without injuring the cause of the United States in the conflict; and somewhere and at some place must be found the authority, or at least that which we shall recognize as the authority, to say when it will and when it will not be injurious to have the matters made public.

Here we have, first, the Secretary of War—that means the President of the United States and the administration—saying that these matters in detail ought not to be made public. Then we have the Committee on Military Affairs saying that it ought not to be made public, upon full consideration of all of its details by that committee, and that, in my judgment, ought to be enough to satisfy the membership of this committee and of the House. [Applause.]

This is an immense appropriation we all recognize, but it meets with the approval of the military authorities after the most careful consideration, and this increase of the Aviation Corps meets with the approval of the people. It is the one important branch of the service that we can most materially and most quickly strengthen. Delay is not justified in this action. It is of almost supreme importance that this great branch of our service, most promising and most important, should be strengthened to the full extent of our ability and resources. I want to see this bill pass quickly, for I have confidence in the general belief that no other single act can do so much toward winning a speedy victory.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this appropriation or any other sum necessary to carry out the purposes of the Government, so great is my faith in the aeroplane as a practical instrument of war.

It is provided in this bill that no one shall be appointed unless he is found, under the regulations of the Secretary of War, to be competent for the purposes of that position. That there must be regulations there is no question of doubt, but that the regulations required by the Secretary of War under this bill will be as impracticable as they are now there is no manner of doubt in my mind. In inquiring into the mentality of an applicant it is necessary—or was necessary—that the applicant be a college graduate or else its equivalent. Now, that has been modified only in degree. The requirement now is that he shall be a high-school graduate or the equivalent.

Mr. MADDEN. No; begging the gentleman's pardon, it requires that he shall be a high-school graduate, with sufficient other experience to be the equivalent of a college graduate.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is not the way now.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think my statement is correct, that he must be a high-school graduate or its equivalent. As the requirement was before its modification, there was no flier in the United States who could gain admission into this Aviation Corps. Art. Smith, who is admittedly the greatest airman produced in the United States, could not gain this admission; and because of the fact that he could not do it he went over to France, and is flying under the colors of France to-day. Numerous men who had ample intelligence not only to be the mechanicians required but who had ample intelligence to transact all the business necessary, who had ample intelligence to be commanders of men, but were deficient in the fact that they had not college diplomas, failed in their applications to get into the Aviation Corps, and as many more will fail because of the fact that they are not high-school graduates. Now, it occurs to me that this bill should be amended, or else that the Secretary of War should be requested, and comply with the request, that in solving the question of mentality a high-school diploma or a college diploma be not made one of the requisites. There are many men who have these diplomas who are not fit and can not be made fit to do the work required in the Aviation Service. Upon the other hand there are many men who have not college diplomas or high-school diplomas, but who have the intelligence, the nerve, and all the qualifications fitting them for this extraordinary service, who would make excellent aviators. So I say either this bill should be amended in that respect or else some regulation should be established not requiring a diploma as a prerequisite.

Mr. CALDWELL. It is contemplated that sergeants will fly under this bill, so that it will not take commissioned officers, as formerly.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But unless the regulation is changed, before a man can be a sergeant he must have this diploma, for that is a fixed rule now in the War Department. I came in contact with it no longer ago than last week, when a man from my district, who, to my mind, has all the qualifications not only to fit him as an officer but to fit him to render excellent service, was turned down because of the fact that he had no high-school diploma.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. There is nothing in this bill and nothing in the law that makes any such qualification as that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I say it should be put in this bill, for the reason that the regulation which is now exacted by the Secretary of War makes it impossible for a very large contingent of young men who are seeking admission into this Aviation Corps every day to obtain admission, for they are denied admission because of the fact that they have not a college or high-school diploma, no matter how well qualified to perform the service required they may be.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, the gentleman takes into consideration the fact that something besides merely being a pilot is required of an officer of the Aviation Corps.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. A man must have military information and be able to understand what he sees in reconnoissance work and be able to apply it to military purposes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely; but whether he possesses or does not possess a college diploma or a high-school diploma does not necessarily supply those qualifications.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But the words "or the equivalent thereof" indicate the means by which he can qualify.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The trouble with the whole business is in the enforcement of the regulations, for in the experience that I have had and that other Members have had, when the fact is developed that a man does not possess a diploma he is given no opportunity to show whether he has the other qualifications or not. The trouble is that such men are given no opportunity to show their mentality.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My time is up. So I can not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I think that the world situation is a justification of speedy action by this Congress upon this bill. The forces both on sea and land are in a contest which to this time appears to be deadlocked, which we hope to break. If it were a matter of determining a policy, I would think we ought to take time to discuss it in detail. If it were a question of how to raise an army, or the method of raising money to support the Army, I am sure it would enlist the judgment of everybody that full deliberation should be given to it; but in this particular bill we have no policy to settle. All questions involving important policies, such as the enemy-trading act or food-control bill, should have ample and full support. We have settled the policy of the Government in several different bills in this Congress, every one of which was fully discussed; but here is a bill not of policy but which requires the keenest technical knowledge, and also the greatest skill in its administration. It is not a matter that Congress is going to determine in public discussion, but a matter that those in the War Department who will have charge of it must determine from the standpoint of greatest strategical skill. For that reason I am ready to vote for the measure at once, without going into the separate details, all of which are in the archives of the Committee on Military Affairs, a matter of record not closed to any Member of the House. For that and other reasons I hope that the House will not hesitate to do the thing on the ground that it is not sufficiently public. When we see the youth of the country in uniform going to the front, we should not hesitate to do what is necessary to reach the best results at the least loss of life. What we do here should not give in advance information to our enemy. In that case what we do, if we do it in public, our enemy will duplicate just as soon as its ability will permit it to do so. Some people think it will do so anyway; but, fellow members of the committee, if I can read the forces as they are, the world seems to be in a deadlock; armies on all fronts are more or less at a standstill. The sea is in a similar situation, and if we can add this particular strength in the air we can break that deadlock; and while we are not doing it on the sea, while we are not doing it at the front, it seems to me that here is the opportunity to have the most speedy application of our greatest ability to turn the balance in our favor. For that reason I am going to vote for this measure, and vote for it just as soon as the opportunity comes for me to cast my vote.

I want to say something in extenso about the evolution of the science of aviation and the connection therewith of the Wright brothers. The Wilbur Wright field, the greatest of its kind in the world, now rapidly coming to its completion, is located in my district, and in a very few days the beginnings of what this country proposes to do will be there demonstrated, since there will be flying through the air within sight of my home those who are later on to carry this effectiveness under our colors to the fighting fronts.

Mr. Chairman, the consideration of the proposed measure now before us illustrates the statement that each decade makes its own history. This is so apparent that various periods are identified by the major energy of that period. The last four decades have been stamped with the application of electricity, as the electrical age.

Just now we are in the midst of the aeronautic age. The flying machine and the human flier have been the theme of song and story, of jest and earnest, of sketch and caricature. But not until the last half of the past century did the undertaking take on serious consideration. The possibilities were sufficiently seriously considered as to cost the lives of many inventors. Letour in 1854, De Groof in the same year, Lilienthal in 1896, Pilcher in 1899, and Lieut. Selfridge, over at Fort Myer, in 1908. These fatalities were in the experimental stages of aircraft.

Mr. Chairman, in the history of the genesis of aeronautics as it is limited to heavier-than-air craft, there appear many names in many countries. As in the case of the invention of the steamboat there will appear many claimants to the honor of the aeroplane. The names of Stringfellow, Henson, and Wenham all appear in connection with the prototype of the aeroplane. Of course, it is quite natural that the British public but not the British authorities will claim the honor of the invention on behalf of Wenham, who died in 1908. The German public but not the German scientist will claim the honor for Otto Lilienthal, who died in 1896, from an accidental fall while attempting to fly. He, as is the case of most Germans, secured his position in history of the development of aviation by leaving important records, works, and investigations in the science of aeronautics. One of the most distinguished and best known to this science is the famous Sir Hiram Maxim. He has the honor of being the builder of the first power-driven flying machine with steam, an engine of 350 horsepower and total weight of machine 7,000 pounds. This venture did not prove a success.

Mr. Chairman, in this field of invention, as in that of many others, this country holds first rank. The enumeration of inventions which make up the first steps of modern world progress will give to America greatest space. The science of aeronautics, or that portion of it which includes the aeroplane, has received its greatest awakening in this country by American contribution. It is not proper here and at this place to go into the relative claims of Prof. Langley, late of the Smithsonian Institution, whose great work must ever stand as a long step toward successful aviation. His work was successful as far as he carried it.

But now, I desire to call attention to the work of the Wright brothers, Wilbur and Orville, of Dayton, Ohio.

These inventors began their work in a modest way, both as to financial ability and support and publicity. Their reticence and natural aversion to what so many crave, the limelight, enabled them to pursue in their small shop their investigations. I well remember the air of ridicule that greeted the first hints to the public that these boys had built a craft that could actually glide through the air above the earth. It was of that sort that surrounds the claimant of the discovery of perpetual motion. But these quiet workers kept secret their preformances until they were ready to make demonstrations that could no longer be kept from the public. They at once stepped from the rank of the proverbial "crazy" inventors to that of the pioneer of successful aviation.

Their first experiments were confined to perfecting a machine on the principle of gliding. Their type was the double deck. They conducted their practice in eastern North Carolina to insure freedom from fugitive air currents and obstructions on land. Their gliding was not high, to avoid injury in case of a fall. This feature was assisted by the soft sand over which the gliding was to be accomplished. The brothers by practice became skillful and demonstrated beyond doubt the possibility of so manipulating the plane as to glide through the air safely if power could be applied and utilized. In case of power supplied by mere gravity, they could land safely, no matter how high in air, by the skillful manipulation of the plane. The longest glide was made in October, 1902, at Kitty Hawk. It was over 600 feet. These brothers were demonstrating a principle they strongly contended possible, which now is well known, that air navigation was feasible by heavier-than-air bodies if to the skillful manipulation of the plane to secure the advantage of the buoyancy of the air there could be add the motor power.

In 1903 they built the first motor aeroplane and made a successful test, keeping it in the air a little short of a minute—to be exact, 59 seconds. These tests demonstrated the possibility of the motor aeroplane, on which the brothers worked ceaselessly. In 1905, in October, they established a record of a flight of 24 miles in 38 minutes. During the year of 1905 many flights, covering hundreds of miles, were made, which fully demonstrated successful aviation and the primacy of the Wright brothers. This success fired all Europe, and spasmodic attempts were there made. The most important was that of Archdeacon and Santos Dumont, both in 1906. These foreign attempts were not successful. The next year the first really successful aeronautic feat by a European was performed by Farman, who flew a half mile in a field near Paris, and won a prize later for a flight which was officially recorded. In the future, when the old records will be examined to establish the honor of first successful flying, the French will claim the honor because of this record, and no official record by governmental decree was kept of what the Wright brothers did four years before Farman made his flight. However, his success set all France by the ears, and aviation was soon to be a decided French enterprise. Nineteen hundred and eight might be called the banner year for aviation. In midsummer of that year Wilbur Wright went to France, leaving his brother in America, so that both European and American fields could be operated. The brother in France at first did not succeed so well. His first flight was in August, but, owing to defective working of engines, he was not showing much advancement. However, within a month he made a trial trip and remained in the air 39 minutes and 18 seconds, breaking all French and European records. But Orville, here at Fort Myer, on the 9th of September, broke all records thus far made by staying in the air lacking 2½ seconds of an hour. Later on the same day he remained in the air for over an hour, and on still another test he remained in the air six minutes with a passenger accompanying him in the machine. As I recall, this passenger was Gen. Squier, now the head of this service. Just a week after this phenomenal performance the unfortunate accident in the death of Lieut. Selfridge, due to the interruption of the machinery when a propeller became entangled with the rudder, cast a gloom over the enthusiastic performers in aeronautics. Four days after this distressing accident of Orville, his brother, established a new record by remaining in the air 1 hour 37 minutes and 25 seconds, covering a distance of over 56 miles. Up to this date the record of Farman was in the air 20 minutes and 19⅘ seconds, reached on September 6. On the same day Delegrange reached his best record in the air 29 minutes and 53⅘ seconds, covering 14 miles. On the 29th of September Farman remained in the air 42 minutes, covering 24 miles, and on the 2d of October he increased this by 2 minutes and 32 seconds, covering 25 miles. On the next day Wilbur Wright, with a passenger, remained in the air 55 minutes and 31 seconds, covering 36 miles, and on the 6th of October, with a passenger, remained in the air 1 hour 4 minutes and 26 seconds and covered 42 miles, and on the 11th he covered 50 miles in 1 hour and 9 minutes.

Successful aviation by this time was assured, and many steps were taken by as many individuals and companies to further develop the science.

I need not enter into the unfortunate confusion arising out of charges of infringement upon patents which for the time, through crimination and recrimination which filled the columns of the press and threatened prosecutions, retarded the advancement of the science. The tardiness with which capital launched into investments for aviation development because of unsettled status of the invention hindered the growth and development. In the meantime individual aviators were constantly adding to the remarkable air feats already performed. The annual aviation meets soon came to lose their former significance because of the familiarity of the flights.

When the world war came with all its suddenness the one branch of the military service much thought of was that of aviation, but mainly as the eyes of the army rather than defensive or offensive service. Since August, 1914, advance in the science has been so rapid that what is done to-day is no suggestion of what may be done to-morrow. We have little conception either of the ability or possibility of this branch of service as it is now carried on in the war areas. Even in our own country, while we have been hesitant as a Government, our school at San Diego, Cal., showed wonderful possibilities as early as 1915, the first year after the opening of the European war.

But, Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to do more here than to indicate the Wright brothers' part in aviation.

Sir Hiram Maxim, the famous British inventor, concedes to these brothers the honor of first rank. He says:

> There is no question about it, the Wright brothers were the first to perform free flight in the air. Not only this but the work they have done and the machines they have constructed are so much superior to the machines of the Farman and Delegrange type as to be considered in a totally different category. It has been my great pleasure to witness flights with the Wright machine near Le Mans, France, and I can testify with Mr. Wright on board he had as complete control of his machine as a skillful boatman would have on a placid stream. The machine rose from the ground, mounted at a fair height, and traveled at a high velocity. It turned corners the same as a bird would have done, and when traveling in a straight line it moved with the evenness of an express train.

In 1909 Wilbur Wright was awarded a gold medal by the French Academy of Science, and later the Wrights received many other medals. The Government purchased, for $30,000, a model from them, the first official recognition given them by their own Government.

The January number, 1910, of the American Journal of International Law, in discussing the law of accident from aerial navigation, relates the interesting episode in Wilbur's life while in Europe. It asserts that in one of his demonstrations in Germany he directed his flight over the head of the German Kaiser. Had the accident in the mind of the law writer really occurred, it most certainly would have modified the history of the world, whatever the damage to be assessed might have been.

Mr. Chairman, it was about this time in the Wright evolution that I frequently observed their operations on their field near Dayton, Ohio. Their flights were made in the afternoon when the atmosphere was most favorable and all that, Mr. Maxim asserts, could be corroborated by the farmers around about and the thousands of spectators from the trolley, steam trains, automobile, and on foot as they came to witness the new art of flying.

To stand on the roadside and witness a man coming directly toward you in a great aeroplane but a few feet off the ground, just high enough to tip the tall weeds, produces a sensation not to be described.

When the Wrights came from Europe back to Dayton, the greatest demonstration ever given in the Miami Valley was tendered in their honor.

Mr. Chairman, I well recall the announcement of the brothers in the daily press that on a certain day back in 1910 one of their best operators would make a record flight from Dayton to Columbus for the purpose of carrying 70 pounds of silk. This was to be the first delivery in history of merchandise from seller to buyer by way of the air in an aeroplane. The navigator was the famous Philip Parmalee who had distinguished himself at the Belmont field and who later was killed in accident at Los Angeles. The distance was 65 miles. The published schedule indicated about what time he would pass over the various towns on the route which included our college town. I announced to the students that morning that near 10 o'clock there would pass over the campus an airship carrying the first commodity ever transported by aircraft in an aeroplane, and it was worth our while to witness it. Our first intimation of its approach was the sound of the engine plainly audible; soon in the distance could be easily seen the flying man, 1,500 feet high, approaching with the speed of the wind and with the agility of a bird. Including the time it took to lift, circle about to get his bearings, so as to direct his course, and also the time necessary to alight, the trip of 65 miles was made in 67 minutes. This rate of speed was exceeded in the same year by M. Barrier at Memphis, when he established the record of 87.93 miles per hour.

By this time air navigation by heavier-than-air craft was established, and the science began to develop along the lines of time, distance, elevation, control of flight, and carrying power. The rapid perfection opened up new fields of legal interests. The international law of aerial space is one of the most interesting. The liability for accident in aerial navigation is another.

Denys P. Myers, in 1910, conducted a series of articles in Aircraft covering phases of aerial rights under the various heads of international relations, such as neutral and belligerent rights, contraband, and so forth.

Aerial navigation is the law of the three dimensions as the land is of two dimensions. The science has grown so sufficiently distinct as to add a very distinct new field in the world's thought. The field has already produced valuable contributions, the bibliography of which is quite voluminous.

The chief concern to-day, as suggested by various treatises, is the field of aircraft in war. It is new and naturally largely speculative. The science of aviation has generally developed after the meetings or conferences of world powers. Consequently the Hague conferences were substantially silent on the subject. Only one paragraph in the convention in 1907 that was slightly modified to include aviation, paragraph 25, relative to bombardment in land war reads as follows:

> The attack or bombardment by any means whatever of undefended towns, villages, dwellings, or buildings is forbidden.

The words "by any means whatever" were distinctively inserted to cover dropping bombs from aircraft.

It is well to say here that under that article Prof. Holland, one of England's greatest authorities in international law, and Col. L. Jackson, of the English Army, both raised the question in April of 1914 whether London could not be legally bombarded from the air. The colonel wrote in the London Times, April 27 of that year, his opinion that she could be lawfully bombarded if the before-mentioned clause is the extent of the regulation. A city with troops in barracks or garrison and fortifications on coast was not "undefended." Holland did not seriously disagree to this opinion. This feature is to-day occupying the best thoughts of our international lawyers. There is small ground to believe New York or Boston or Washington are legally immune from attack from the air by an enemy. Many proposals have been suggested to define war rights in the air. Some of them have been submitted to conventions or institutes of international lawyers. Probably one of the most comprehensive is that of Fauchille submitted to the Institute of International Law at its Madrid session in 1911. While the work was largely his own, he had submitted the draft to many of his colleagues for suggestion before formally presenting it to the convention. The document is most suggestive and interesting in the new field.

Mr. Chairman, in the proposal which we are now considering this Nation is entering this new field as a military necessity. The craft for military purposes has passed beyond the experimental stage. I am persuaded it will be our most decisive stroke in our efforts to bring this war to an end. My purpose is not to discuss the aircraft as an instrument of war, important as it is known to be. I simply desired to refresh the country's memory on the part the world owes to the Wright brothers in this newest field of invention.

On Memorial Day, 1912, the world was shocked when the press carried the sad news that Wilbur Wright had passed away at his home in Dayton, a victim of typhoid fever. I was in the city the night of his death. No one can depict the gloom of the people of his home city, which had become historic throughout the world because of the achievements of himself and brother. Editorial after editorial declared that the death of such a man, at the age of 45, from a preventable disease was a public crime.

His brother Orville has never given up his interest in aeronautics, and is at this very hour directing the work on the aviation field, where more than 3,000 workmen are completing the largest and most beautiful field of its kind in the world.

A letter from home to-day says:

> We are working on 11-hour schedule now in order to complete it as soon as possible. Three hundred and fifty men in uniform are here now, mostly mechanicians; only about 40 actual fliers. The first flight will be next week.

Mr. Chairman, it seems altogether fitting that the Government, which early recognized the skill of the Wrights, should select the Wright field and christen it the Wilbur Wright Field, where the first flights were made, as the nucleus for its greatest field of preparation to make the decisive stroke in the air, which all hope will end the world-wide campaign of almost universal destruction. In the unshaken faith of American achievement I willingly vote to-day authority for unlimited expenditure of money to harness, through American energy, the possibilities of the air to stop this world tragedy.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FARR. Will the Government have control of the Wright field?

Mr. FESS. Absolute control. The Wright field is now under the control of the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have an abiding faith in the part that warfare in the air is to play in the determination of this war. You have reached a peculiar condition in both land and sea warfare, a condition largely of stalemate, a condition on land where the defensive power of man with modern armament is so great as to make negligible the value of the preponderance of great numbers on one side or the other. You have the difficulty that comes from concealment, that comes from mining and countermining in land and naval warfare. In the air you fight in three dimensions. You fight where concealment is practically impossible; you fight where the preponderance of men is the determining factor in a very much greater sense than in any other war activity. To-day the allies are holding approximately on equal terms the control of the air with Germany. We alone of all the nations in the war are not using every ounce of energy in the building, equipping, and use of fighting machines of the air. We alone are in a position to bring into the scale great resources that have as yet been hardly touched, and by bringing them in give such a predominance in the air as to unquestionably have a very marked and, I believe, a speedy determination of the issue.

Believing that, it is impossible for me in any way to undertake to obstruct the passage of the bill that will carry the authority and money for rapidly putting the great power of this country to the aid of our allies in aerial warfare. I was not willing to fight the proposal of the Committee on Military Affairs to carry with this bill of authorization also an appropriation. I am not now willing to interfere with it, but because I take that position I do not think it amiss to call the attention of the House to the need of steering a course between the two extremes that have been mentioned here to-day.

I foresaw at the beginning of this war that the old relationship that existed in regard to appropriations and the details of them was one that had to pass away, and I called the attention of Congress—I think in the first speech I made after the declaration of war—to the fact that we must of necessity trust the departments in a degree and to an extent that we never dreamed of before. I was not willing to undertake to tie them down with hard and fast restrictions. While I recognize that and you recognize that, I submit in all fairness and candor you do not have to go to the other extreme and put no restrictions on them of any sort. I think that before a month shall have gone by this Congress will be asked to consider an appropriation that will make this appropriation seem a small one. The argument could then be made that is made now, that there should be nothing but a lump sum.

I speak with knowledge. I have read and carefully examined every detailed item that goes into the making up of this $640,000,000, so that it is not a matter of theory with me.

I know that it is possible, and I think it would have been desirable to have carried certain items of this $640,000,000 so as to restrain the power to expend the moneys for certain purposes beyond the amount expressly named. I think it would have been desirable to have done that in regard to the purchase of land, and the doing of it would have given no information of any value on earth to the enemy. I think it would have been easily possible to have done it as to a number of other items. I am not going to ask the committee to stop and do it now, because it can not be done on the floor. I am not going to offer an amendment to that effect. I am not going to ask the committee to take the bill back and correct it, but I am making the statement so that the doing of this thing will not be taken as an acquiesence by Congress in the proposition that has been urged with great force and persistency on the Committee on Appropriations that we should make no classification of appropriations touching war matters because any classification was a restriction and a handicap.

Now, I think this suggestion an extreme position, just as unjustifiable a position as the position of the man on the other hand who thinks he is wise enough to arrange in detail for all the unforeseen things arising from day to day in connection with this war. What I trust is that in the future we will try to steer a middle course. It is not an easy thing, but I trust that Congress will exercise a discretion, and in some matters undertake to express its will, and where the discretion must be with the department, it should give full information to the committee that is dealing with it. I agree with the gentleman on the Military Affairs Committee that there is much that ought not to be talked of on this floor. I believe I am in possession of detailed facts in connection with every phase of this program. I made some effort to arrive at that information, and I was afforded all the facilities both by the Committee on Military Affairs and by the War Department, so as to advise myself. I believe the amount carried in the bill is substantially correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the early enactment of this bill into law, and I would proceed in such a way as to conceal the details of its purposes from the enemy; but while doing that the attention of the enemy may well be called to the fact that whether the rumors that come from Germany this morning are true or not there are certain facts that ought to be called to the attention of the people of Germany and to the people of Governments making up the central powers.

A cameo condensation of the conditions confronting the people of the central powers is, first of all, that they have a combined population of 140,000,000, a combined wealth of $134,000,000,000, a combined annual income of the population of $17,000,000,000; and, second, that the combined population of the entente allies is 426,000,000, the combined wealth $464,000,000,000, and the combined annual income of the people sixty-six and three-quarters billions.

If the chancellories of the central powers do not take notice of the difference between these controlling factors in the central powers and in the entente allies, that in the end, whenever the end may be, will decide the result of the war in favor of the entente allies, the people of the central powers should take notice of the difference in these potential facts, and take that notice now.

The chance of the central powers to win the war was lost at the end of the first three months of the war. After 40 years of preparation Germany did not win in the first days of the war. Germany and her allies in these first days utilized the best they had—complete preparation in every detail, masterful organization, and an inspiration born of the hope of a quick and decisive victory. The allies were then unprepared, unorganized, and completely stunned by the first blows of the war. Now they are prepared, have organization, have added materially to their numbers, and are fired with the hope of certain victory in the end. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT]. [Applause.]

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to express my sincere appreciation of the compliment paid me by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in yielding to me more time than any member of the committee has consumed or reserved for himself. As most of the Members of the House know, I have been an enthusiastic advocate of aeronautical development, not only for military but also for commercial purposes, since I have been a Member of this body. And realizing both the need of expediting the consideration of this bill appropriating $640,000,000 for military aeronautics and the necessity of concealing all that it is intended and expected to accomplish under the authority of its provisions, I shall not undertake to discuss its merits, but propose to place before you, in concrete form, a brief statement of the skepticism, official and otherwise, with which history is replete concerning practically every great discovery, every great invention, and every great engineering feat and many great reforms in government that have been harbingers of progress.

Some gentlemen have stated their willingness to dispose of this bill without debate and vote for it with their eyes closed. I do not agree that the former would be wise, but I think you will be convinced, before I get through, that in the case of each of these great discoveries and inventions even those who had their eyes wide open knew the least about them.

DISCOVERY OF AMERICA.

In 1470 Christopher Columbus arrived at Lisbon and soon became absorbed in the papers of his father-in-law, an old sea captain. Columbus had come to believe that he could reach the eastern coast of Asia by sailing west, but he was poor and needed financial assistance for such an undertaking. He asked aid from the senate of his native town, Genoa, but they turned to him a deaf ear. He next applied to King John of Portugal, who, on recommendation of a council of geographers, refused him. Columbus left for Spain. Ferdinand, the Spanish King, referred the proposition to a council of astronomers and geographers. They, too, decided the project was vain and visionary, so Columbus started for France, but on his way met some persons of influence, who interceded for him with the Spanish Queen, Isabella, and he was recalled to the court and secured royal aid in April, 1492.

Great difficulty was experienced in finding sailors for such a trip. At last the little fleet sailed, and after three weeks at sea and no land sighted the crews lost courage. Columbus prevailed upon his men to continue, and land was sighted October 12, 1492, which proved to be the island of San Salvador.

Eighteen years had elapsed between the time when Columbus had conceived his enterprise and that October morning when he discovered a New World. The people of his day had thought him crazy, and those years were spent in poverty and neglect, nor did the slander and jealousy and misrepresentation ever disappear after he had proved that the world was round.

CIRCULATION OF THE BLOOD.

As early as 1616 Dr. William Harvey had lectured in public upon his theory of the circulation of the blood, although he did not publish his treatise until 1628.

John Aubrey, to whom we owe most of the minor particulars about Harvey, said that following the publication of his book "He fell mightily in his practice; 'twas believed by the vulgar that he was crack-brained; and all the physicians were against him." Harvey himself foresaw that his discovery would be scouted by the learned physicians, and so stated in the preface of his book.

THE SPINNING JENNY.

James Hargreaves, a weaver, invented the spinning jenny, an improvement on the old-fashioned spinning wheel. He first used such a machine in 1764.

The spinners did not take kindly to this improvement when they discovered that Hargreaves could do more spinning with less work with his machine. Hargreaves was considered a foe rather than a friend by the spinners, and was driven from Lancashire to Nottingham.

COTTON MANUFACTURE.

Richard Arkwright took out his first patent in 1769. A little later he built a complete factory at Cromford, on the Derwent River. The people about Cromford came to see his machine and to buy stockings, but the big Manchester manufacturers refused to trade with him, although they needed his yarn. This forced him to find some way of using his large output, so in 1773 he began to make for the first time fabrics entirely of cotton.

Following this manufacture of cloth in England, an act was passed, based on the assumption that the English spinners could never compete with Indian handiwork, so a duty was imposed on all calicoes and varieties of cotton goods originally imported from India. This duty was also levied on the products of Arkwright's mills, and merchants canceled their orders to avoid the same. The act was too unfair to stand and after a time was repealed. Nevertheless, it showed the strong opposition he encountered. Not only did the manufacturers unite against him but the operatives showed stubborn resistance. Even the courts of law decided against the validity of his patents, but in spite of all these trials Arkwright proved to be as able an organizer of industry as he was an inventor, and he became rich while establishing one of England's greatest industries.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

In welcoming the first ambassador from the new Russian Republic to this country, in the House of Representatives, about a fortnight ago, the distinguished and beloved Speaker said:

"When our fathers proclaimed this Republic at Philadelphia, July 4, 1776, there was only one other Republic on earth—Switzerland; and the fathers were not certain this one would live until Christmas. It was an even break whether it would or not. Now, thanks be to Almighty God, there are 27 Republics in this world. In a large sense we made them, every one; not by conquering armies, not by the mailed hand, but by the wholesomeness of our example, by teaching all creation the glorious fact that men can govern themselves. Until then the theory was that political power descended from on high and lighted upon a few tall heads, and a little of it trickled down upon men below. We reversed all that and made it begin at the bottom and go up like the sap in the trees in the springtime, and it will go up forever."

THE POWER LOOM.

In 1785, Dr. Edmund Cartwright, a clergyman, succeeded in producing a machine which did for weaving what had already been done for spinning. When brought into operation such was the prejudice and envy of the neighboring manufacturers and such the ignorance of the operatives that an establishment in which 500 of the new looms were employed was willfully burned down.

THE LOCOMOTIVE.

In 1786, a petition was presented to the Pennsylvania Legislature by Oliver Evans, in which he asked for the sole right to use wagons propelled by steam on the highways of that State. In the same memorial he also requested a similar right in connection with a steam flour mill. The legislators listened with tolerance to his explanation of the principles of his mill, but when he began to discuss a vehicle designed to move along roads by its own power and mechanism their patience came to an end, and a belief arose that Evans's mental capacity was becoming seriously impaired. Later, 1804, he built a 5-horsepower steamboat and put wheels under it and ran it through the streets of Philadelphia as proof that his idea for operating land wagons by mechanical power was a sound one. Oliver Evans said:

When we reflect upon the obstinate opposition that has been made by a great majority to every step toward improvement from bad roads to turnpikes, from turnpikes to canal, from canal to railways for horse carriages, it is too much to expect the monstrous leap from bad roads to railways for steam carriages at once.

George Stephenson's first locomotive, christened the "My Lord," was tried on the Killingworth Railway in 1814. Encouraged by his success, he took out a patent in 1815 and started to build a series of locomotives, each an improvement over its predecessor. These first engines were used for hauling cars at the coal mines. At length it was sought to obtain recognition in Parliament.

When it became known that the bill would be proceeded with, the public were appealed to, pamphlets were written, and the newspapers hired to revile the railway. The poisoned air from the locomotives would kill birds, houses would be burnt up by the fire thrown from the chimneys, boilers would burst and blow passengers to atoms, and there was always this consolation to wind up with: That the weight of the locomotive would prevent its moving.

Stephenson had said to friends that he was confident that a locomotive could be built that would carry a train of cars at the rate of 20 miles an hour, but such a claim would have been received by the public as ridiculous and the engineer laughed to scorn. His opponents tried to badger him in every way they could. Very few of the members of Parliament understood Stephenson's invention at all. A distinguished barrister represented about the general level of ignorance when he said:

Any gale of wind which would affect the traffic on the Mersey would render it impossible to set off a locomotive, either by poking the fire or keeping up the pressure of the steam till the boiler was ready to burst.

GAS LIGHTING.

An engineer, William Murdock by name, living at Redruth, in Cornwall, first introduced gas as an illuminator of streets and buildings. In 1792 he constructed a small gas meter and apparatus for lighting his own house. Satisfied with his achievement, Murdock inaugurated a gas-lighting exhibition at Soho, Birmingham. In 1808 he was awarded a medal by the Royal Society; still the invention made little or no progress in London. This new agent, everyone said, was dirty, had an ill smell, and produced headaches; street-lamp lighters went on a strike and parish authorities declared their intention to uproot any lamp-posts and pipes planted in the streets in their jurisdiction. People could not understand the possibility of so conveying gas and thought that the pipes themselves would be full of flame. Even Sir Humphrey Davy sarcastically inquired whether it was intended to use the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral as a gas holder.

THE COTTON GIN.

With the aid of Phineas Miller, Eli Whitney completed his machine for ginning cotton. By the spring of 1793 its success was assured and a patent was taken out.

The first dramatic scene that followed was the theft of the machine from Miller's house and before Whitney could finish his model numerous machines similar to his were used in the fields, but the superiority of Whitney's invention over all the others was at length accepted by the South.

VACCINATION.

Dr. Edward Jenner, the discoverer of vaccination as a prophylactic against smallpox, was only ridiculed and calumniated when he first propounded his theory in 1796. Many opposed vaccination as a useless and dangerous practice. Before publishing a pamphlet on the subject Jenner went to London in order to demonstrate the truth of his discovery, but he remained there for three months without being able to find any person who would submit to be vaccinated.

STEAMBOAT.

In 1796 Robert Fulton accepted an invitation from the United States minister at Paris, where he devoted seven years to the perfection of various new projects and inventions. Among these was the submarine boat carrying torpedoes; but he was unable to secure its adoption by either the French, British, or the United States.

Later came the project of the Clermont, and the hull was built at Corlears Hook on the East River, and the engine built in England was safely stored in a warehouse in South Street, New York.

Plenty of people laughed at the enterprise, and few thought that it would amount to anything. Idle-minded men crowded near the shipyards and gave their reasons for predicting the certain failure of "Fulton's Folly," as they called the boat. This was unpleasant, but Fulton took no notice, for he long before realized that only wise people can grasp new ideas. Lack of money proved a hindrance, but still Fulton attended to every detail until on the 17th of August, 1807, the Clermont made its first voyage. There were almost as many quaint descriptions of the Clermont as there were people who saw it. One described it as an "ungainly craft, looking precisely like a backwoods sawmill mounted on a scow and set on fire." Others said the Clermont appeared at night like a "monster moving on the waters, defying the winds and tide, and breathing flames and smoke." Some of the ignorant along the Hudson fell on their knees and prayed to be delivered from the monster.

NITROUS-OXIDE GAS.

In 1800 Sir Humphrey Davy experimented with nitrous-oxide gas, commonly known as "laughing gas," and discovered its anæsthetic qualities. He suggested its use in surgery, but for almost half a century his suggestion passed unheeded. Not until 1844 was nitrous-oxide gas administered in sufficiently large quantities to produce complete insensibility.

THE JACQUARD LOOM.

Jacquard, the famous silk weaver of Lyons, conceived the idea of an apparatus for figured weaving, and in 1801 sent a model of it to the National Exposition of the Products of Industry, receiving a patent for his machine the same year. He also invented a machine-made net, which came into the hands of the prefect at Lyons, and this functionary, for what reason no one knows, placed Jacquard under arrest, and sent both him and his machine to Paris. In Paris he was awarded a gold medal and his machine approved. Upon his return to his native city, where he sought to introduce his machine, he met with opposition and a violent prejudice. Frequently he was in personal danger. Even the "Conseil des Prudhommes" of Lyons conspired with the operatives to ruin him, and ordered his machine to be broken up and sold for old iron and old wood. He later received the cross of the Legion of Honor, and in 1840 a statue was erected to his memory in the city which had formerly treated him with so much ingratitude.

THE ERIE CANAL.

As a circumstance which is considered epoch making in the history of America the Erie Canal must be considered a greater marvel than the building of it. It would be difficult now to propose an engineering feat that is within the range of sanity that would provoke so much ridicule and debate as did the plan to build the Erie Canal through those hundred of miles of dense forests and reeking swamps in 1816. A bridge across the Atlantic or a tunnel underneath it could scarcely provoke more sneers to-day. Yet the summer of 1817 saw the stakes driven into the ground, over hill and vale, through dense forest and sickliest swamp, from east to west, and its completion made possible the establishment of the commercial supremacy of New York City.

THE REAPER.

In 1831 Cyrus McCormick, a Virginian, after several trials produced a machine that successfully cut grain, but this first reaper was a crude invention. The following year he demonstrated his machine to an audience of harvesters who were none too eager to see a mechanical device enter into competition with their work. The farmers grew indignant and protested that McCormick would ruin all their wheat, and the laborers began to jeer and joke at the machine's expense. In spite of his audience his demonstration was quite successful. Next he undertook to market his machine, which proved much more difficult than demonstrating it to the countryside. In 1833 he advertised it in the Lexington Union, but there were no answers to his advertisements. So skeptical were the farmers that it was seven years before a reaper was sold. He had faith enough to take out a patent in 1834. During the panic of 1837 McCormick surrendered his farm and other property to his creditors although none of them were sufficiently interested in the crude reaper to consider it worth taking.

Finally his faith met with reward. In 1840 a stranger rode up to his workshop and bought his reaper for $50. A little later other farmers invested, and he had the satisfaction of knowing that in the harvest of 1840 three of his reapers were used. By 1844 he had sold 50 machines, and the log workshop had become a busy factory. Necessary materials were not to be obtained in Virginia for his growing business so in 1847 he established himself in Chicago where his great industry grew to tremendous proportions.

LOW-RATE POSTAGE.

Sir Rowland Hill's scheme for a uniform and low rate of postage was first laid before the public in 1837. Although favorably received by the merchants and bankers, the post-office authorities immediately derided the new scheme. Lord Litchfield, then postmaster general, said of it in the House of Lords:

Of all the wild and visionary schemes which I ever heard of, it is the most extravagant.

Eventually the proposal was embodied in a bill and passed the House of Commons, becoming a law in August, 1839.

TELEGRAPH.

Samuel F. B. Morse invented the telegraph with the aid of Alfred Vail and his father, Stephen Vail, who financed the experiments. In 1837 Morse filed an application for a patent of his invention. In December of the same year he failed in his effort to secure from Congress an appropriation for an experimental line which he proposed to build between Washington and Baltimore. In May, 1838, he went to Europe seeking aid. The governments there refused him funds or patents. In May, 1839, he returned to the United States and began a heroic struggle for recognition. During this period he often suffered for the barest necessities of life. Finally, after repeated disappointments, the House of Representatives of the Twenty-seventh Congress, on the last night of the session, March 3, 1843, by a vote of 90 to 82, appropriated $30,000 for building a trial line between Washington and Baltimore. The bill had been made the object of opposition and ridicule; one official, to show his contempt for the project, proposed that half the amount asked for should be used in mesmeric experiments. Morse, believing that the Senate would defeat the appropriation, went to his lodging place to retire for the night. Early the next morning information reached him that a little before midnight the Senate had passed the bill, thus turning apparent failure into success, but not until six years after the invention had been made.

RUBBER GOODS.

During the 10 years 1830–1840 Charles Goodyear was frequently imprisoned for debt. The use of rubber during this time was attracting general attention, and he became interested in finding a way to increase its utility. Much of his experimentation was carried on in prison. He became the butt of those who did not share his faith in the ultimate success of his experiments.

Early in 1839 Goodyear found that rubber coated with sulphur and then heated was rendered uniformly elastic in all temperatures. He had solved the problem, but it was two years before he could convince anyone of the fact. Finally, William Rider furnished capital for carrying on the process of manufacturing rubber goods.

Goodyear's friends regarded him as a monomaniac. He even dressed in his rubber clothes in order to test them. Upon being asked how Mr. Goodyear might be recognized, a friend replied:

If you see a man with an india-rubber coat on, india-rubber shoes, and india-rubber cap, and in his pocket an india-rubber purse with not a cent in it, that is Goodyear.

THE SEWING MACHINE.

The hope of relieving his extreme poverty set Elias Howe to work in 1843 on the invention of the sewing machine. By May of the next year he had sewed the first seam with his new machine.

George Fisher, who had formerly a partnership with Howe, became discouraged after two years, with no profits from the machine, and Howe himself, seeing no prospect of revenue, took employment as a railroad engineer. Finally he determined to try to market his invention in England. An English machinist examined the machine, approved it, and paid him $250 for it. His fourth machine, which he constructed in England, he was obliged to sell for $25, in order to procure money enough to return to America.

About 1850 the sewing machine began to succeed commercially, after being opposed and ridiculed by the very class whose toil it did so much to lighten. Curses instead of blessings had been showered upon him by tailors and seamstresses; nevertheless Howe lived to reap the reward which he so justly deserved.

THE SUBMARINE.

John P. Holland, an Irishman by birth, became imbued with the idea that underwater navigation could be accomplished.

After two years of unsuccessful efforts he came to America, where upon his arrival he was ridiculed as mercilessly as he had been at home. In 1873 he undertook to build and completed the first boat in 1875. It was not a great success. But he persevered, and coming into touch with men who were planning for the liberation of Ireland, they financed his idea, in the hope of using it against the British Navy. With an improved craft the inventor performed various evolutions and was a constant source of wonder, fear, and amusement to those who saw him. Ridicule gave way to speculation concerning the influence of the submarine on future naval development. But years slipped by and Holland's name and his boat became almost a memory. Finally, in 1895, the Government determined to take up the subject and called for a design. This brought forth but one set, that was accepted, and to the surprise of the country the successful candidate proved to be Holland. The first boat built by the Government, the Plunger, was a dismal failure, Holland's criticisms having been ignored. His disgust was so profound that he severed all connections with the Government, but with characteristic Celtic tenacity of purpose he bought back the boat, thus closing all avenues for future altercation, and started another boat according to his own ideas and under his own supervision. This vessel, christened the Holland, upon completion created an intense sensation.

At last, after years of toil, he had succeeded and the future success of his invention appeared to be assured.

THE TELEPHONE.

On March 10, 1876, Alexander Graham Bell succeeded in making an instrument that would transmit conversation. Although this invention became an object of great interest, two months later, at the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, business men could see little future for its development for practical purposes. They admitted that it was very ingenious, but declared that it could only be a toy. Bell himself was not sufficiently well versed in business to know how to make the most of his invention, so Mr. Hubbard began a campaign of publicity, and by August, 1877, there were 778 telephones in use. This success lead to the formation of the Bell Telephone Association. Hubbard offered the Bell patents to the Western Union Telegraph Co., but President Orton, declining the offer, said: "What use can this company make of an electrical toy?"

People refused to regard it seriously, its mechanism was so incomprehensible. It remained a mystery for years after it had come into practical use.

In the same way, I might continue indefinitely with respect to the discovery and development of the science of electricity from Gilbert to Franklin and its application by Edison, Marconi's wireless, and countless other inventions, discoveries, and world-renowned achievements.

The achievements of every successful man are but the realized visions of his youth, his dreams of bettering his condition, of enlarging his power.

Our homes are the dreams that began with lovers and their efforts to better their condition; the dreams of those who once lived in huts and log cabins.

The modern luxurious railway train is the dream of those who rode in the old stagecoach.

But I do not want to pass without narrating a few of the interesting details concerning the fulfillment of the dream of the airship.

THE AIRSHIP.

The late Prof. S. P. Langley, former Secretary of the Smithsonian Institute, once said that a man who conceived a great idea was looked upon as crazy; when he demonstrated the correctness of his theories it was an accident, and when its value had been conclusively established it had always existed.

In 1896 he launched a picturesque steam model airdome, the result of years of tireless research. To the mind of the inventor this proved conclusively the practicability of mechanical flight. In 1898 the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, after studying the flights of 1896, allotted $50,000 to enable Prof. Langley to build a one-man flyer. On August 3, 1903, he tested a gasoline-driven aeroplane, which elicited favorable commendation from those present.

On September 7, 1903, Prof. Langley tried his man-carrying aeroplane, and again on December 8, 1903, but both trials were marred by accidents to the machine before leaving the launching ways. Langley had really developed a machine capable of sustained flight if properly launched.

He was subjected to unmitigated censure and ridicule, because he had incurred enmities due to his official secrecy. This irresponsible criticism, combined with the abandonment of the work for want of funds, doubtless hastened his death. The Aero Club of America shortly before he died sent a set of resolutions acknowledging the value of his efforts to promote aerial travel.

Prof. Langley was on his deathbed—

Says Alexander Graham Bell—

when these resolutions were brought to his attention; and when asked what should be done with the communication his pathetic answer was, "Publish it." To all who knew his extreme aversion to publicity in any form this reply indicated how keenly he felt the misrepresentation of the press.

The first official statement of progress in flying was made in letters of the Wrights in the Aerophile in 1905 and to the Aero Club of America in 1906. In telling the story of their invention in the Century for September, 1908, they said:

Late in the autumn of 1878 our father came into the house one evening with some object concealed in his hands and, before we could see what it was, tossed it into the air. Instead of falling to the floor, as we had expected, it flew across the room and struck the ceiling, where it fluttered a while and finally sank to the floor. It was a little toy known to the scientists as a helicopter, but which we, with sublime disregard for science, dubbed a "bat." * * * It lasted only a short time, but its memory was abiding.

At that time, Wilbur Wright was 11 and Orville 7 years old.

When the Wright brothers read, in 1896, of Lilienthal being killed by a fall from his glider, they began to wonder what were the real difficulties that must be overcome in flying, and it was not until 1900 that the Wrights seemed to appreciate that the only problem to be solved was that of equilibrium. Men had made aeroplanes that would support them in motion, also engines that were made light enough to carry their own weight and that of the aviator, but when the wind blew the aeroplane was as likely as not to capsize. Their study was how to keep the machine from turning over. They seemed to have been singularly successful in keeping their experiments from the public, first outside of Dayton, Ohio, and then at Kitty Hawk, N. C., where they continued them. After the Wrights's successful flight of 11 miles in September, 1905, field practice ceased for more than two years, and their machine was dismantled to preserve secret the modes of its construction until the patents could be disposed of.

But from the time the Wrights imparted their secret to the Aero Club of America, of which I am proud to be a member, its officers, and particularly Mr. Alan R. Hawley, its president; Mr. Henry Woodhouse, one of its governors; and Mr. Augustus Post have labored zealously to promote the science of aeronautics.

And it may not be amiss, Mr. Chairman, to mention at this time the great part which the National Aerial Coast Patrol Commission has played in the past two years in undertaking to impress upon officials and the public alike the tremendous importance of aviation, in both its military and commercial uses.

Under the direction of its chairman, Rear Admiral Robert E. Peary, United States Navy, retired, this commission labored in season and out of season, often against great opposition, to transform indifference into enthusiastic appreciation of its manifold opportunities for governmental employment and development. Members will recall that the commission exhibited aeroplanes, the use of which you were invited to avail yourselves, opposite the House Office Building and near the Senate Office Building at the time that I offered the amendment, which was finally adopted in the Senate, whereby the total appropriation for aviation was increased to $13,281,666 in the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

The honorary chairman of the National Aerial Coast Patrol Commission, of which I have the honor to be one of the commissioners, is the Vice President, Hon. Thomas R. Marshall, and the other members are Senator Morris Sheppard, of Texas; Senator James E. Watson, of Indiana; Senator James H. Brady, of Idaho; Representative Julius Kahn, of California; Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Byron R. Newton; Assistant Secretary of War William M. Ingraham; Alan R. Hawley, president, and Henry Woodhouse, governor, of the Aero Club of America; John Hays Hammond, jr.; Emerson McMillin, banker; Lieut. F. Trubee Davison, Naval Flying Reserve; Dr. H. C. Frankenfield, chief forecaster, United States Weather Bureau; Maj. E. Lester Jones, superintendent United States Coast and Geodetic Survey; and Capt. Earl Hamilton Smith, secretary of the commission.

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has emphasized the interesting circumstances that the House of Representatives put flying machines into the Army without any request from the Secretary of War.

The report of the chief signal officer in 1910 contains the following passage:

MILITARY AERONAUTICS.

(See War Department Annual Report, vol. 1, p. 650.)

Although the United States was the first Nation to officially recognize the aeroplane for military purposes and issued specifications in December, 1907, and carried out official tests in September, 1908, demonstrating the practicability of mechanical fight, yet such has been the rapid development of aerial navigation since that date that this country has been left far behind in its aeronautical equipment and its trained personnel. In fact, the only aeronautical equipment that this Nation possesses at present consists of one small practice dirigible balloon, one Wright aeroplane, and three small captive balloons.

It may be said without hesitation that the principal military subject at present engrossing the attention of congresses and parliaments of European first-class powers is the possible influence of aerial navigation upon the military art. In the past year aeronautics, as far as our Army is concerned, has been practically at a standstill. In the meantime European powers are displaying marked activity in the development and supply of both the dirigible and the aeroplane for war purposes.

It is frequently said that the United States, due to its isolated position, is not likely to become involved in war, and therefore the most economical procedure in aerial navigation is to wait until other nations have determined upon the types best suited to military purposes, thus shifting the expense of experiment and development to other nations. In reply to this, it must be remembered that in 1897 no one believed that the United States had any prospect of a war, yet within one year from that date we were actually involved in a war with Spain without any adequate military preparation for war, which resulted in great confusion, expense, and unnecessary loss of life. Furthermore, experienced military airmen can not be created after war is declared, and the demands of this new service will undoubtedly require higher qualities of training, judgment, and courage than any other branch of the military service. Military authorities agree that the only way to meet aerial attack is by similar weapons, and that there is no chance of adequate protection being given locally. The advent of aerial navigation has, in fact, extended the vulnerable area of a country to every acre of its territory.

Had the department heeded the recommendations of Gen. Allen in 1910 we would not have been so woefully unprepared when, as I pointed out in a speech in this House on the 27th of last April—

A year ago Villa's raid brought out the fact that we had 12 aviators and 6 aeroplanes * * *—

Although Congress had appropriated in the Third session of the Sixty-first Congress (1911)	$125,000

Second session of the Sixty-second Congress (1912)	100,000
Third session of the Sixty-second Congress (1913)	125,000
Second session of the Sixty-third Congress (1914)	250,000

Making a total of $600,000.

Moreover, Congress provided by chapter 186, passed July 18, 1914—

That there shall hereafter be, and there is hereby created, an aviation section, which shall be a part of the Signal Corps of the Army, and which shall be, and is hereby, charged with the duties of operating or supervising the operation of all military aircraft, including balloons and aeroplanes, all appliances pertaining to said aircraft, signaling apparatus of any kind when installed on said craft; also with the duty of training officers and enlisted men in matters pertaining to military aviation.

SEC. 2. That, in addition to such officers and enlisted men as shall be assigned from the Signal Corps at large to executive, administrative, scientific, or other duty in or for the aviation section, there shall be in said section aviation officers not to exceed 60 in number and 260 aviation enlisted men of all grades; and said aviation officers and aviation enlisted men, all of whom shall be engaged in duties pertaining to said aviation section, shall be additional to the officers and enlisted men now allotted by law to the Signal Corps, the commissioned and enlisted strength of which are hereby increased accordingly.

In this connection it is interesting to note that while in 1913 the United States had only expended $300,000, it stood thirteenth in the list of nations according to the amounts respectively appropriated.

Germany lead the list, with $12,000,000; France was second, with $7,000,000; Russia, third, with $6,000,000; Italy was fourth, with $4,000,000; Austria was fifth, with $3,000,000; England was sixth, with $2,000,000; Japan was seventh, with $1,000,000; Belgium—little Belgium—was eighth, with $800,000; Brazil was ninth, with $500,000; Bulgaria was tenth, with $350,000; Greece was eleventh, with $325,000; and Spain was twelfth, with $310,000.

In the Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, the Committee on Military Affairs reported a provision in the Army appropriation bill appropriating $1,122,000, the amount recommended by the chief signal officer, and asked for by the Secretary of War for aviation. An amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] increased this amount by $2,000,000, which was adopted. It was then my privilege to offer an amendment further increasing the amount to $14,552,900, and although ruled out on a point of order, the matter was taken up with the President, Secretary of War, and Senator CHAMBERLAIN by the officers of the Aero Club of America, and myself, with the result that the appropriation was increased to $13,281,666, and already in the present session there has been appropriated $43,450,000.

It may also be interesting to call to your attention the appropriations which have been made covering the same period for the Navy:

Third session of the Sixty-first Congress—1911—there was appropriated for experimental purposes $25,000, and in the second session of the Sixty-second Congress—1912—$20,000. No further appropriation was made until the second session of the Sixty-third Congress—1914—when $10,000 was allowed.

In the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress there was appropriated $3,500,000, and already during the present session there have been appropriated $11,000,000, and a few days since the Secretary of the Navy submitted a request, which I understand is now before the Committee on Naval Affairs, for an additional appropriation of $45,000,000.

While I shall vote for this bill, it does not meet with my approval. In my judgment the War Department is now too much overburdened. Accustomed to operate within an appropriation of approximately $150,000,000 per year, we have recently voted $3,000,000,000, the judicious expenditure of which will tax every bureau to its utmost capacity. Believing that a separate department should have been created to supervise the expenditure of the appropriation carried in this bill, I appealed both to the chairman of the Senate and House Committees on Military Affairs for a hearing on Senate bill 80 and House bill 3, introduced by Senator SHEPPARD and myself on the opening day of the present session.

Before the Senate subcommittee, of which Senator SHEPPARD is chairman, such distinguished authorities have appeared as Rear Admiral Robert E. Peary, United States Navy; Maj. Gen. George W. Goethals; Lieut. Col. L. W. B. Rees, of the British Royal Flying Corps; Frederick H. Allen, one of the organizers of the Lafayette Escadrille; and Adjts. Frederick H. Prince and Lawrence Rumsey, of that illustrious squadron, and many others, all of whom emphasized the need for the establishment of a separate department of aeronautics or a bureau which would concentrate and centralize all power and coordinate all aeronautical activity under one head for the purpose of effecting its efficient development. None appeared to oppose the idea except the Secretaries of War and Navy, from whose respective departments it would have drawn power and influence. Before the House committee the only witnesses called, at the one hearing held, were Mr. Hawley and Mr. Woodhouse, of the Aero Club of America, and Dr. Steinmetz, president of the Aero Club of Pennsylvania, men who have given the best part of their lives and earnest efforts to the development of aeronautics and who declared unequivocally their belief in the absolute need for the establishment of a separate department. Yet the committee have not provided for it in this bill, nor even considered the matter so far as I have been able to learn. They have taken this bill just as it was drawn and submitted by the War Department, and present it to you for your ratification. And I shall not be one in such a crisis to stand out against and fight its immediate passage, because it does not happen to contain a provision that conforms to what may be regarded as a whim or hobby, so far as I am concerned. It has been said, and I realize the probable truth of the assertion that every 24 hours' delay upon our part in putting a substantial force of American aviators in the field on the western front will mean the loss of 5,000 lives of American soldiers, and I would not have taken one moment's time in the consideration of this bill if I did not believe it would aid in its acceleration to final passage.

I know that a separate department must come, just as I appreciated the need of appropriating $13,000,000 when the department had only recommended $1,000,000. If it is not adopted now, when we are practically making a beginning, its adoption can not be averted when those who only now are beginning to realize that the mastery of the air will be the determining factor in this war begin to appreciate what its commercial utility will be when peace is reestablished.

Mr. Chairman, our existence as a Nation began with the thirteen original States; at the beginning of this war we were the thirteenth Nation in aeronautical power; this bill was sent to Congress upon our Fourth of July; it was reported out on Friday the 13th; now let us pass it unanimously on this, the French "Fourth"—the one hundred and twenty-eighth anniversary of the fall of the Bastille.

In conclusion, let me repeat a prophecy which I made on the floor of this House in a speech on the 27th day of last April advocating the dispatch of 5,000 aviators to the western front as our first contribution to the allies' cause, that if our aeronautical activities are developed with good judgment and scientific skill, it will be the deciding factor in the war, so completely fulfilling Tennyson's prophecy that those of us who survive will live to see——the fair white-wing'd peacemaker fly

To happy haven under all the sky,
And mix the seasons and the golden hours,
Till each man find his own in all men's good,
And all men work in noble brotherhood,
Breaking their mailed fists and armed towers
And ruling by obeying nature's powers.

[Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the country that is at war with us entered the conflict with the allied nations of Europe fully equipped and prepared for a long war. She has made many new departures in the military field. Not one of the nations that are neighbors of Germany knew of the things that she was doing in a military way. It surprised everybody when she brought forth her great 42-centimeter guns and battered down the forts that were considered impregnable in Belgium. It was a surprise to everybody when she showed what use could be made of the deadly hand grenade. It was a surprise to everybody when she used deadly gases to kill off her enemies. Not one of those things was known to Germany's immediate neighbors in Europe prior to the time that she began to use those various weapons of warfare. On the other hand, we seem to be intent on going to war as if we intended to go hunting ducks with a brass band. At this time in this country I believe that the details of our war preparations should be kept secret. But the Military Committee did not intend that there should be no discussion of this bill. Under the five-minute rule we expected the House to take up the various paragraphs and debate them fully. We did not think that the House wanted the full details of every item, and I do not believe the House itself does want the full details now. I have my misgivings about the length of this war. I think we are in for a long, terrific struggle. I do not lose sight of the fact that for the next 15 years Germany will be able to put approximately 1,000,000 men into the field, fully trained and equipped, every year to carry on the war. I do not lose sight of the fact that Germany has conquered and now holds thousands of miles—yes, hundreds of thousands of miles—of enemy territory, and that she is drafting the civil population of the lands she now holds to plow the fields and grow the crops in the conquered territory in order that the German people may be fed.

Those are the things which we must consider in preparing for this war, and in such preparation aeronautics will play a very important part. Therefore I feel that the less information we give out as to the program which we intend to follow the better for our country and the better it will be for an early conclusion of the war. I recognize the fact that this is no child's play we are engaged in. I recognize the fact that the American people have been told that we must win this war through the air. If we embark upon a program that is advertised extensively our enemy will know what we are doing and our entire program will prove futile.

Oh, gentlemen from the Committee on Appropriations tell us that they think we should put into the bill a provision as to how much money can be expended for the purchase of land. The moment you deduct that amount from the total sum appropriated the enemy will know that that much less money will be expended for aeroplanes.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. We do not expect to spend a great many millions for land?

Mr. KAHN. No; but every dollar——

Mr. GILLETT. It will not make much difference, then.

Mr. KAHN. Every dollar you notify the enemy you are expending for land they will deduct from the total sum. They will know that that much less will be available for the manufacture of aeroplanes and the necessary equipments for the aviation section.

Mr. GILLETT. But out of $640,000,000 it would not give them very much definite information.

Mr. KAHN. I do not think it is advisable to give them any information, and I for one am opposed to giving them any information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Under the agreement of the committee all general debate is closed, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the existing emergency, which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available, the President be, and is hereby, authorized to increase temporarily the present authorized commissioned and enlisted strength of the Signal Corps of the Army, including the aviation section thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will have the Clerk report the committee amendments and they will be disposed of and then the Chair will recognize gentlemen. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "in view of," and insert "for and during."

The amendment was agreed to.

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "which demands the raising of troops in addition those now available."

The amendment was agreed to.

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "temporarily."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the purposes of this bill and do not expect to oppose it, but in view of some of the things that have been said in the brief general debate, I wish to make one or two observations at this time. I have particular reference to what has been said by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Military Affairs, with regard to the necessity for keeping secret our plans with respect to the Aviation Service. I presume, of course, that is an instinct of military necessity that we should keep our plans, so far as attack and operation may be concerned, secret from the enemy, but the bill we have before us now involves an appropriation of an enormous amount of money, $640,000,000, which is to be appropriated in a lump sum, and which must be accounted for sooner or later to the taxpayers of the United States. It may be that we expect to expend some of this money in foreign countries; I do not know. I hope the mere suggestion is not revealing any information that may be of comfort to the enemy, but the gentleman from California and the chairman of the committee and the members of the Committee on Military Affairs generally—as well as the gentleman from Illinois, who received much applause for his suggestion that the bill ought to be passed without debate—have insisted that it was unnecessary to tell the House of Representatives what was to be done or how this $640,000,000 was to be expended.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The chairman of the committee [Mr. DENT] stated that he would be glad to give any individual Member of the House the needed information as to details, but he did not think it was advisable to discuss it in the open House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly. And I heard the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] make a statement of similar tenor; but that is not the way I want information as a representative of the people on this floor. Now, so far as this demand for secrecy and for keeping the House from details of expenditures is concerned, I wish to say that if any Member of the House who desires to take the trouble will turn to pages 5045 and 5046 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this morning he will find given in substantial detail the plans which apparently have been agreed upon for the conduct of the Aviation Service. And why this information should be revealed to another body which has nothing to do with raising the money from the people who must pay this enormous bill while this House, especially having to do with taxing the people, should be left in ignorance of these details, I do not know. My judgment is that a committee of the House that keeps from the House information that is available to another body is not doing its full duty by the House. I happen to be a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, which is charged under the rules with raising the revenue to pay the appropriations made in bills of this kind, and I have been one of those who have listened for several months past to the complaints, not only of the poor people but of the business people and of the rich people of the United States, as to the taxation we are to impose upon them. The people have a right to know something about the manner in which their money is appropriated. They will be coming to this Congress soon—surely by next December—with their grievances. It is to be expected that they will want to know about these expenditures. The first revenue bill passed by this session of Congress proposed to raise only $1,800,000,000 or less. Now you are appropriating in this new appropriation bill, to one section of the Army service only, what is equal to six times the amount that in normal times would be appropriated for the total Army service of the United States. And there will be more bills of this kind for which taxes will have to be levied. It is well to bear that in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

It does seem that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my friend Mr. MOORE, should understand that the Committee on Military Affairs does not want to cram a bill through this House without any information given to the membership, but, as stated by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], and the ranking member on the other side, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], the War Department have specific reasons why they do not want all of this detailed information to come from such an authenticated source as the House of Representatives would be. And it looks like that every man who is voting for all of this war expenditure should understand that we must trust the department to properly expend this money.

Certainly the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] knows that it is absolutely necessary, in order to win this war, to have this great amount of money expended on aeroplanes. As to whether or not this money is to be spent according to the way the gentleman there wants or that I want, we must not consider. It must be spent according to the views of the experts. Already this Signal Corps Department has the representatives from the French Government and the English Government and the Italian Government here, designing and planning the type and the number of machines, and the kind of warfare that should be carried on in the air. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants this House to publish that information to the world, in order that the Government of Germany may know how to defeat this great aeroplane warfare that this Government is endeavoring to carry on, he would get it by having all of it made public.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, I do not want any information to come through this House that will give comfort or aid to the enemy, but I want to ask the gentleman if this House is not entitled to as much detailed information through the Committee on Military Affairs as another body seems to get and use in a public way?

Mr. QUIN. I can not answer that, except——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And as found on pages 5045 and 5046 of this morning's RECORD.

Mr. QUIN. All we can attempt to do is to look after this end of it. [Applause.] If the other end of the Capitol proposes to give out secrets which would inform the Kaiser of what we propose to do, we can not help it. Let us keep our own skirts clean. Let us carry into effect the necessary part of legislation to win this war. We are already in a great crisis.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. QUIN. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. As I understand it, the War Department now wants to put the seal of secrecy upon the aeroplane program?

Mr. QUIN. Those are the instructions we have.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does not the gentleman from Mississippi know that through the official channels some three weeks ago detailed information was given out, purporting to come from the War Department?

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. The Secretary of War explained to our committee that he never knew anything about it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The amount of the appropriation, the number of aeroplanes, the number of aviators were all detailed.

Mr. QUIN. Any Tom, Dick, and Harry can go and put a lot of stuff into the newspapers, but what the American Congress does is official, and that is the reason the Secretary of War wanted us to observe a little respectability and decency so far as carrying out this program is concerned. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Would the gentleman give me three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. QUIN. I understand, as long as this war has been going on, that not only the United States knows nothing, but even France and England are unable to ascertain, as to what Germany is doing. The Germans understand how to carry on a war. The United States, although it is a great democracy, must in this time and in this crisis be willing to conduct its war business in some sort of a secret manner. I do not know and do not care to know in detail how much of this money we are going to spend for these different things. We do not know what is necessary. These gentlemen who are responsible for it do know, and we must rely on them.

We must rely on their integrity; we must rely on their ability and their patriotism. If we can not rely on that, we might just as well not appropriate a dollar. We are appropriating $640,000,000 here at one time, for aircraft warfare. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was afraid that it might not all be expended in the first year, the fiscal year. It is my judgment that this Congress will be called on to appropriate a much larger sum at the next session for this aeroplane warfare, and if it is necessary to be done we ought to do it willingly, because, according to what these gentlemen who understand it say, the aeroplane warfare is the most potential and important part of it. It will keep the men from being thrown into the trenches. One aeroplane is worth, according to the testimony, at least one regiment of Cavalry. It has been recognized in England that it is worth much more than that. It is worth as much as 12,000 to 15,000 cavalrymen or private soldiers. Then if one aeroplane, with two individuals upon it, is worth so much in this war, why should we inquire into the details so narrowly, and publish to the world what number of aeroplanes we are going to have, and how many men will be on them, and whether or not they will carry 2,000 or 5,000 pounds of explosives, and so on? I do not care. Before this war is over I believe we will have them that will carry as much as several tons of explosives in their magazines and so destroy the enemy.

Mr. Chairman, I think this bill ought to be passed without so much talk and without so much fuss and feathers. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman in charge of the bill.

I notice the committee saw fit to change the phraseology in the beginning, and I think it is a very material improvement on the original bill. Would it not be better, instead of saying "during the existing emergency," to say "during the existing war"? That point arose during the consideration of another bill, and I understand the change was made. Personally I do not like that word "emergency." I do not know exactly what it means.

Mr. DENT. That language has been used in every temporary measure that has been presented to the Congress heretofore.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But that language has been changed.

Mr. DENT. No. In the act enlarging the Army it reads "during the existing emergency." The House won out over the Senate on that proposition. The reason is that there may be a cessation of hostilities, and yet for months afterwards there might be an existing emergency that would make it necessary to keep the forces together.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. An emergency might arise from any one of a thousand causes. The gentleman will understand that, and under that language that would be continuing authority.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman will notice that it is only "the existing emergency."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The emergency that now exists might be continued by reason of causes that do not now exist. But if the gentleman assures the House that this is the language in the other bills I will not press my point further. The first time I looked at it I found this language was changed as it came from the Senate.

Mr. DENT. The Senate finally, in the urgent deficiency bill, put in a provision that the emergency could not continue more than four months after peace was declared.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] during the debate on this bill, in answer to a question, made the statement that this was but the beginning of a continuing policy. Does that mean that it is the beginning of a policy that is to continue beyond this war or is it simply a war measure?

Mr. DENT. This is strictly a war measure. It is limited by the terms of the act to the existing emergency. That is the reason why we changed the first section. As it was prepared in the War Department, the increase is authorized temporarily. We thought that that was too indefinite, and we put in the language "during the existing emergency."

Mr. REAVIS. I know; but as to the language of the bill the statement was made by the ranking member that this was the beginning of a continuing policy that Congress would be asked to maintain in the future.

Mr. DENT. I think the gentleman from California can speak for himself; but, voicing what I understand was his intention, I think he meant during the continuance of the war. I do not think he meant that that would be a permanent peace policy, because the War Department itself is not asking for that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to offer an amendment, and I had submitted it to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs—an amendment which seeks to add, after the word "emergency," in line 3, on page 1, the words "of a state of war between the United States and Germany," and striking out of the comma. I offer that suggestion for the purpose of completing the bill, and I think it should be adopted to show what the emergency is.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If it were perfectly patent that the war would cease at the end of next month, it would not be possible to stop any expenditure of this appropriation at that time. Is not that perfectly patent?

Mr. GARD. Well, I would say so; yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. So that if the gentleman would say "for and during the emergency," or "for and during the war," these appropriations were available, it would not require further elaboration.

Mr. GARD. The cessation of war would be made known, of course, by a proclamation of the President. It would not be intended, as I understand, to make application of this bill after the war has ceased.

Mr. KAHN. No; but there would be things going on where you could not stop off short automatically.

Mr. GARD. That may be.

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman that that is the reason why the Senate finally yielded. I stated to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] a little while ago that that was my recollection of the act to temporarily increase the Military Establishment, and that is precisely how it reads:

That in view of the existing emergency.

That is the way we passed the law, and I think it ought to conform to that language.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, about the year 1903 Wilbur Wright and Orville Wright, brothers, worked in the very early morning and late evening in an old frame shack on a tract of land about 10 miles out from their home city of Dayton, Ohio, upon a machine heavier than air which would fly under motor control.

Poor in purse, they were wealthy in wisdom, for they had seen the wisdom of the great flying fleet involved in this bill now under consideration.

Noting the soaring flight of the great birds, they became convinced that a flying machine could be made and operated, and so before and after their daily work was done, almost every spare moment utilized, they sought to evolve into fact that which was hitherto considered a dream.

To-day the old shack in which they worked stands almost in the center of the great aviation field of 2,500 acres of land.

It will be allowed to stand there surrounded by all the modern buildings necessary for aviation purposes.

The original 80 acres of land where the first practical flying test of airplane was made by the Wright brothers is included in the immense tract now used. The field is known as the Wilbur Wright Field, a memorial for one who died before the result of his inventive genius and untiring labor was fully understood.

To-day 2 miles of hangars are stretched in a long line to accommodate the flying machines on this field, and back of those are the administration buildings and others necessary for a full field equipment.

About May 27, 1917, the contract for the grading and draining of this field and the erection of the buildings thereon was made with the idea that actual flying might begin about July 15, and so speedily and well has the work progressed that on Wednesday, July 11, a very considerable flying force was in actual flight upon this field.

When completed at least 600 young men per month will be given instruction in everything connected with this work, the young men coming after a two months' course in State universities and being afforded here a four months' course in aviation.

Therefore it can be seen that the flying force will be of the very best and highest character of the young men of our Nation.

Boys who have been seeking to educate themselves in our State universities offer their services and their lives to this Union of States.

This is not a restriction to be made against any of the young men of the country, but the service is of such an important character as to be an incentive to the enlistment of the young men of the very highest type.

The existing state of war in which the United States is engaged has made a veritable challenge to American ingenuity and industry.

Until this war the battles between countries were waged on the ground and on the water. Practically everything in warfare has been settled by battles on the ground, for infantry, cavalry, and artillery have been used in offensive forces for many years, and their development has been the development of improvement.

But the development has been as much on one side of the present great conflict as the other, and the modern rifle and artillery and the skill of military engineers in the field has been matched upon either side.

For the past few years it has been apparent that the submarine has been the most effective of modern warfare weapons.

The submarine of one power is just now beginning to be competed with by the submarine of the other powers and soon there will be little or no difference in the efficiency of the undersea boat.

Then, too, invention is making known the means of detection of the submarine, and when seen the submarine is able to do but little harm.

It is in the air that the war may be decided, and this has been the opportunity of America and she has risen to the occasion.

The tremendous value of a flying squadron as a fighting force is now very generally understood and appreciated.

Not alone as a scout but as an actual fighting agency, for airplanes now constructed abroad are of such size and carrying capacity as to be literally "war machines."

America's response to this new war need has been the placing of most capable men in design and construction and the education of aviators who are destined to carry the cause of freedom upon the wings of their planes to the far-flung battle front.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, because I think, first, the plan contained therein, when properly worked out, with our efficient flying force, will win the war, and for the additional reason that it is the one of war's abhorrent activities which will have a commercial residue of value.

When war shall have ceased, the result of invention and industry will have been such that the development of the flying machine will be not a development of hazard, sport, or slaughter but afford a new and effective means of transportation in times of peace, bringing increased efficiency and happiness to all people.

This, America's newest contribution, is a winning factor in war and in peace. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That to provide temporarily the additional commissioned personnel required by this act the President is authorized to promote, appoint, detail, or attach as temporary officers in the Signal Corps, including the Aviation Section thereof, officers of the Regular Army, National Army, or National Guard, or the Officers' Reserve Corps, or to temporarily appoint enlisted men of the Regular Army, enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, or persons from civil life: Provided, That no person shall be so promoted, appointed, detailed, or attached until he shall have been found physically, mentally, and morally qualified under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That officers with rank not above colonel shall be appointed and commissioned by the President alone, irrespective of the rank or grade held by them on the date of the passage of this act, and that officers above the grade of colonel shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, irrespective of the rank or grade held by them on the date of the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the word "temporarily."

The amendment was agreed to.

And the following committee amendment:

Page 2, lines 6 and 7: Line 6, strike out the word "temporarily," and after the word "appoint," in line 7, insert the word "temporarily."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I should like to know whether anything has been said—I assume that there will be no difficulty about divulging such information if anything has been said—by the representatives of the War Department who have appeared before the committee regarding the promotion of these men with respect to their activity in aviation. In other words, will the officers who will be put in charge of the squadrons or wings, or whatever designation may ultimately be given to the several groups under which they will operate, be men who are versed in aerial activity or will they be men brought over from the Infantry and the Cavalry and the other departments of the Army who have had nothing whatever to do with aviation?

Mr. DENT. Of course, the only answer I can give to that is that the War Department expects to put into this service men who have had experience rather than to put in green men in the first instance, if that is what the gentleman means.

Mr. HULBERT. Is it not true now that men are being transferred to the Dayton field and to the other training camps that are being established from the Cavalry, men who have had no experience whatever in aeronautics?

Mr. DENT. Oh, well, that is a training camp. Of course, they have got to train a large number of men who are absolutely green now.

Mr. HULBERT. I merely wanted to get at the point, if the gentleman knows, how it is proposed to regulate the manner in which the officers are going to be promoted who will conduct any of these flying units or squadrons?

Mr. DENT. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry, I can only say that I am sure the War Department will do what I believe they ought to do, because I have enough confidence in Gen. Squiers, the Chief Signal Officer of our Army, to believe that he will promote those men who have had experience and who are the most competent.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOOD of Indiana offers the following amendment: Insert, after the word "war," in line 12, page 2, the following: "but such regulations shall not provide any fixed scholastic attainment for determining the mentality of such person.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is to provide against the arbitrary regulation now in force in the War Department. We all justly admire the beautiful tribute paid to the Wright brothers by the Representatives from Ohio, Mr. GARD and Mr. FESS. There are many other young men in this country to-day who are not graduates of colleges or not graduates of high schools who have all the ambition and all the enthusiasm of the Wright brothers, and who are just as anxious for an opportunity as they were in the days of their struggles for recognition of their genius. The Wright brothers, or Orville, the survivor, could not qualify to fly one of his own machines under the present regulations of the War Department.

Mr. DENT. I made a statement in answer to a question by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], that I had been informed by the War Department that they had revoked that rule.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They revoked it to inaugurate another a little less drastic. They have revoked the rule requiring a college diploma, but they have adopted the rule that he must be a graduate of a high school or its equivalent.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I called up the Aviation Bureau and they stated that no such requirement was made. There are only two requirements—a man must have an experience as an aviator and have some practical knowledge of aviation machinery. Those were the only two qualifications required.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If they have revoked the high-school qualification, they have done so within a week.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to say that I called up the Aviation Section 15 minutes ago and was informed that the rule which formerly obtained of requiring a graduate from a university had been modified so that now he may be a graduate of a high school, a preparatory school, or an academy of equal grade, but the board has the right in specified cases to consider special circumstances and waive all these requirements if in the judgment of the board the man is otherwise equally as proficient as if he had been a graduate of a high school or one of the other schools named.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. So at the present time you can not tell from one day to another what the requirements will be the next day. If my amendment is adopted, it will afford an opportunity to a young man who desires to enter this branch of the service to enter upon his own merits.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FESS. What is the content of the word "scholastic" in the gentleman's amendment, that there shall be no scholastic requirement?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I mean that there shall be no fixed requirement. My meaning is that he shall not have to have a diploma from this school or that school; that the degree of his ability by reason of the requirement that he shall be a graduate of a school shall not be essential. If the man has never been in school at all, he may possess mentality far superior to the man who has been in school all his life. It should be so that a man should have a fair opportunity to have his ability determined, regardless of whether he has been to school or not. I appreciate the fact that a certain degree of mentality must be had, but to say that it must have been acquired at school, at a college or a high school and evidenced by a diploma, is not right. It is not offering a fair opportunity to the ability of the young men in this country.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The whole matter that the gentleman is arguing has been taken care of by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT], who states that all these regulations are done away with or that they are in the alternative.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have a concrete example in my State where a young man who is a flier, who has the mentality to command men, was turned down because he was not a graduate of a college or high school, and they gave him no opportunity to be examined on his degree of mentality.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. When was that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Less than 10 days ago.

Mr. FESS. That is not under these regulations.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We do not know that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman know that that was the cause of his rejection?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. He was given to understand that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Where does the gentleman get that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. From the Chief of the Bureau of Aviation.

Mr. McKEOWN. Under that regulation in eastern Oklahoma, where there were no school advantages up to a short time ago, the boys would have no opportunity to enter this service?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely; and there are many men in this country who have not been to college or a high school that will be shut out.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, personally I do not think there ought to be any regulation by the department limiting the appointment of men to this service to those who hold diplomas either from a college or a high school, and I have so stated to the Chief of the Signal Corps, and he has informed me that these regulations have been abrogated. I do not see any use in encumbering the bill with a lot of details. If you should adopt this amendment, still the War Department would have the power to turn a man down, because they have the right to pass upon who shall receive the appointment.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. But does not the gentleman think it a good thing to make a specific declaration in regard to it and let them know what Congress thinks about it?

Mr. DENT. No; I think we ought to trust the War Department. I know they are likely to make mistakes there, as elsewhere, but when we talk to them about it they are amenable to reason and are willing to make changes in the regulations. I do not think the bill ought to be encumbered with a lot of amendments directing the War Department how they shall proceed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I personally fail to see the necessity of beclouding this bill in mystery. There is really no necessity for it as long as we keep the type and number of the machines and the type of the motor secret. The enemy must not know the speed and power of the airplanes contemplated. That is all that is needed. However, I am willing to take the word of the members of the committee that they have fully investigated the program of the War Department, and that they are satisfied that the machines can be quickly manufactured in this country.

I do not agree with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that aeronautics is still in the experimental stage and that we are now taking a chance. We have long passed that time. The use of airplanes has been established, and they are now essential; in fact, the most useful branch of an army. What I understand is the purpose to accomplish by this bill may be a new departure, but of course it would be improper to discuss that now. The committee has assumed full responsibility for all details, and it is our duty to appropriate the money.

I do not agree either with what has been said about this war being won with the airplanes we provide for to-day. This war will be won in a much more cruel and less spectacular manner. I personally believe that peace can be forced in a short time if this country is able to intelligently and efficiently control the exportation of food and exercise wise diplomacy in controlling the exportation from neighboring nations. The control of food and supplies will be the determining factor of this war.

Now, to get to the amendment before the committee. I want now to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], who offered the amendment. I have had some experience in flying. I assure you, gentlemen, that it will be dangerous to limit the department in any way in prescribing regulations to establish qualifications for student aviators. A man may have a mechanical knack, may be bright and intelligent, and yet unable to acquire all that he must know about the theory of flying in a short time. The example cited by the gentleman from Indiana is of a very well-known aviator. I know whom he has in mind. This man has given exhibitions all over the country and has accomplished wonderful feats. Yet that man would not be able to explain the physical law applicable to the motions of his machine or the reason his "stunts" in the air were possible. Compare his flying with the French aviator, Adolph Pegoud, who first looped the loop. That feat was of great value to the art of flying, because Pegoud was able to intelligently observe and record pressure, tension, and all effect of the air while the machine went through the motions; it demonstrated certain possibilities in flying; it enabled changes to be made in aeroplane construction and made new maneuvers in the air possible and practicable. His "stunts" were of great scientific use. The student who wants to learn military flying must first learn all about his machine—must learn the effect of his machine in the air, must go through a regular course. He must know the "why" of things. Unless his mind is disciplined, is trained to study, and accustomed to acquiring facts and details and retaining them, he will be unable to grasp all this information in the short time available to take the course.

It is true that a good many can learn by practical experience, but this is rather dangerous in aviation. Experience abroad has convinced the department that the best available men only should be used in aviation. I understand that the department will not insist upon a college education, but will require, where the young man can show aptitude, an equivalent which will be determined by other studies pursued or by a mental test to which he will be submitted. The gentlemen must not lose sight of the fact that the aviator must be familiar with his motor, must understand the terminology of the motor and plane, otherwise he would not be able to communicate or explain defects. He must be able to readily acquire knowledge of weather conditions such as air currents, temperature, barometric conditions. He will be required to read weather maps and to verse himself in what is known as practical meteorology for the aviator. The student aviator must likewise familiarize himself in map reading and learn to navigate the air by the use of a compass. I fear the gentlemen are somewhat under the impression that flying a machine is as easy as learning to drive an automobile. I will not say that the mere learning to manipulate an airplane such as the use of the controls, ascending from the ground, flying, and descending requires extraordinary and unusual skill and intelligence, still, apart from the element of danger, a military aviator, such as is contemplated in this bill, must of necessity be able to do and know considerable more than the mere manipulation of a plane.

The gentlemen must also bear in mind that in the course of his duty the military aviator may have other tasks to perform than the mere handling of his machine. He must be able to observe and report facts intelligently and accurately. He must be able to exercise quick judgment in the air. He must be able to repair his own machine if he is caught beyond his own lines. If we want to help carry out the purposes of this bill, let us not hamper and tie the hands of the officials of the War Department. Let us agree not to send favorites to get positions in the aviation department, but let each boy enter on his own merits. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana) there were—ayes 21, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this is one of the most important sections of the bill. Most of the succeeding sections will not attract any interest.

Mr. MANN. Oh, let us get on.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Some gentlemen may not like the idea that some others want to think about the bill; but I prefer to think, although it is Saturday afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have got all the time that I desire, but some others may want to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. The proviso regulating the way in which these officers shall be commissioned provides that all up to and including the rank of colonel may be commissioned by the President without confirmation by the Senate. Above the rank of colonel they have to be confirmed. I understand this is following the rule laid down in another bill heretofore passed in reference to the military forces. Does not the gentleman think, having in mind the fact that this is the creation of an entirely new force of officers, who must be selected from practically an untrained body of men—that is, untrained in aeronautics—that there ought to be some supervision over those appointments? Ought not the Senate to have the power of confirmation?

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I recall the testimony of Gen. Squier to the effect that these are only temporary appointments. They will go back immediately when this force is reduced to its former status.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Temporary during the war; but after the war we do not care what becomes of them?

Mr. CRAGO. They go back automatically.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But during the war is the time when we want efficient men. Our interest ends largely when the war ends.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how an appointment for a general officer in the Army can be temporary?

Mr. CRAGO. These are not general officers. He is speaking of men up to and including the rank of colonel. Gen. Squier impressed this on us. They want to take the younger men of the Army without regard to rank. They want the young men in the service.

Mr. LITTLE. How can the appointment of a colonel be temporary?

Mr. CRAGO. We are making it so by law. If a captain were appointed a colonel under this law, as soon as the force is reduced to the size now authorized he would go right back to his position as captain.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, well, if that is in the law, why do not you read the law?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think I have the floor. I propounded a question to the chairman of the committee——

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Minnesota that the main reason urged upon the committee that impressed me was that there would be a great many officers to be selected, and they wanted to hasten the organization of this force with as little delay as possible, and in view of the fact that those officers were only to be temporary, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO], they thought that the President ought to be empowered to make the appointment without waiting on the action of the Senate.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am informed, and before making the statement I desire to make a further statement that I appreciate quite fully the exceeding difficulty that confronts this section of the Army in selecting officers; they have got a mighty hard job, and all the patriotism and all the brains at their command will not enable them to perform the work any too well. I think they are doing the very best they know how, but they are in the midst of serious difficulties. There is being attracted to the Aviation Corps the brightest, nerviest, most efficient of our youth—what might be called the flower of our chivalry. Some men of inferior quality, of course, are struggling to get in. Now, I am informed, and I say this seriously, that this section has not the approval of the General Staff of the Army. I learned that from an Army officer. I thereupon communicated that fact to a member of the General Staff, who said that he thought the first officer was wrong and that it did have the approval of the General Staff of the Army. I do not know. One man says yes, and the other man says no, both in a position where they ought to know. Can the gentleman inform me whether it has the approval of the General Staff?

Mr. DENT. I can not inform the gentleman any more than what I have said to the gentleman some time ago in response to questions in general debate. I was under the impression that it had the approval of the General Staff, but I can not answer the question specifically; but I know it has the approval of the Secretary of War, the President, and the Chief Signal Officer.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Of course, the approval of the Secretary of War would not really be of any more value than my approval, because I do not think he knows much more about aviation than I do and that is not much.

Mr. DENT. When I say approval I assume the Secretary of War would consult with those in authority in order to ascertain.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And the ones he would consult would naturally be the General Staff. It would have been comparatively easy to have secured from the General Staff their approval of this bill. If any provisions are objectionable, they could have been changed. We all want the right thing to be done. Now, a further inquiry, as my time is running short. These are serious questions. I am informed in the exigency which they are confronted with they have selected a board to determine the qualifications of applicants for commissions, and that this board is headed by a very splendid athlete of the Nation, whose familiarity with aeroplanes is about on a par with mine—exceedingly fragmentary. He may make a splendid man in time. Experienced men are hard to find, but I think this board should be composed of trained and skilled men. Am I correctly informed, or is this rumor without foundation——

Mr. DENT. I was interrupted and I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I said I am informed that on account of the exigency which confronts the Aviation Section the necessity of securing large numbers of enlisted men and the commissioning of large numbers of officers it has been compelled to select a board to determine upon the qualification of men who are applicants for commissions, and that this board is headed not by an aviator at all nor by a man who has had any experience in aviation or in the Army——

Mr. DENT. I know nothing about that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not wish to appear as a critic in any sense. I am keenly interested in this corps of the Army and its measureless possibilities in this emergency. There are physical limitations and the head officers of the Signal Corps have pretty nearly a superhuman task. Every aid that can be extended should be given. The cooperation of Congress should be intelligent. Discussion of some of these features may easily help in overcoming some difficulties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired; all time under this section has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That to provide the additional enlisted men required by this act, the President is authorized to raise and maintain, by voluntary enlistment or by draft, such number of enlisted men as he may deem necessary and to embody them into organizations hereinafter provided for in section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment; add a provision at the end of page 3, line 1, after the word "four," as follows:

"Provided, That the draft herein provided for shall not apply to any person under the age of 21 years: Provided further, That the grades of chauffeur, first class, and chauffeur are hereby created in the Signal Corps. The pay and allowances of a chauffeur, first class, shall be the same as a sergeant, first class, in the Signal Corps. Pay and allowances of a chauffeur shall be the same as a sergeant in the Signal Corps. All chauffeurs while serving as such shall rank with corporals of the Signal Corps and shall be subject to promotion and reduction to any other grade now authorized in the Signal Corps."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Alabama if this paragraph provides additional enlistments may be either by draft or voluntary enlistment. It provides that anyone under 20 years of age may be drafted. What is the maximum?

Mr. HULBERT. Thirty years.

Mr. DENT. There is no maximum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no maximum age fixed now for a man who may be drafted in this aviation provision. Will the gentleman explain why?

Mr. DENT. There is no maximum age fixed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a maximum age fixed in the draft provision, but under this provision can a man over 30 years, which is the maximum age for drafting in the regular arm of the service, be drafted in the aviation arm, and if so, why?

Mr. DENT. I can say to the gentleman from New York this particular feature as to the maximum age limit was not seriously considered by the committee, because the committee was informed emphatically by the Chief Signal Officer of the Army that this was a young man's army, and there was no use of fixing a maximum limit, but I have no objection to fixing the maximum limit.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say it occurs to me that there should be some definite age limit. I do not know what the maximum age should be. It appears to me the gentleman from Alabama ought to suggest the maximum age.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman may not wish to do so, but if he will indicate what it ought to be I will offer the amendment.

Mr. DENT. I am perfectly willing to accept the same age limit as in the draft law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Thirty years?

Mr. DENT. Which covers up to 31.

Mr. FERRIS. Thirty years included will make it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I will offer that. After the word "years," in line 3, page 3, I offer an amendment to insert "or of any person over the age of 30 years, inclusive."

Mr. DENT. Or above the age of 31.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman kindly state the amendment again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I offer the following amendment: On page 3, line 3, after the word "years," insert "nor over the age of 30 years, inclusive."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] offered an amendment to the committee, and the Chair directed the Clerk to report it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FITZGERALD: Page 3, line 3, after the word "years," insert the words "or to any person above the age of 31 years."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is agreed to.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to debate the committee amendment?

Mr. HULBERT. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to rule that that is not in order, because that would be an amendment in the third degree. The gentleman from New York is offering an amendment to the committee amendment.

Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. HULBERT. I will withhold that until the amendment of the gentleman from New York is adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has been adopted.

Mr. HULBERT. Now, I offer this amendment to the committee amendment, which will come immediately after the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HULBERT offers the following amendment to the amendment just adopted: After the word "years" insert:

"Provided further, That no person so drafted shall be assigned to service as an aviator without his consent."

Mr. HULBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I only want to say a word upon this. As the language in the bill, as proposed by the committee, reads as amended by the gentleman from New York, my colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD], any person between the age of 21 and not over 31 years who might be drafted would be compelled to serve as an aviator. It would not be difficult to draft men to get them to serve on the ground or on the water, but, as was emphasized over and over again, the science of aviation is a new departure; it requires a peculiar fitness, and only those who possess a special kind of courage have any place in that service. And it might be that some men who will be drafted into that service would be of much greater value in some other service.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULBERT. In just a moment.

Now, I notice in the report:

It may be stated in this connection that the committee was informed by the chief of the Signal Corps that it is the present policy of the department, from which it does not expect to change, to put fliers in the service only by voluntary enlistment and not by draft.

Well, if that is the present policy of the department, and if they do not appreciate now any necessity for an immediate change from that policy, why should not we as a part of this law embody a clause and make that the law upon that subject?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose there were no voluntary enlistments and that no one consented to fly, should the War Department not be enabled to compel men to serve?

Mr. HULBERT. I want to say to the gentleman, in the first place, that at the present time there have been over 20,000 volunteers for this service. They can get all the men that they want, and as long as they are able to do it by voluntary enlistment why should they compel them to serve by draft?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose the situation should arise where there are no more volunteers, should not the War Department be able to assign men to that service?

Mr. HULBERT. I am opposed to the proposition of providing by legislation that any man must serve by draft as an aviator, except by his consent. What we want to give attention to is the fact that the allies rush their young men into the trenches and now lack a reserve for aviators. It is better, it seems to me, if we encourage all the men who will be called by the draft this month, between 21 and 30, to enter the aviation service voluntarily.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULBERT. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman know what is the practice in England and France in this service? Do they only require men who volunteer?

Mr. HULBERT. My information, from an English officer some time ago, was that they only took volunteers at that time, or at the time he left over there; but in the rapid strides that are being made, I do not know what they are doing now.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULBERT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Suppose a general commanding a force orders a lot of drafted men to take a certain position, knowing that it means certain death to go there and face it, would the gentleman have a provision inserted in the law that the general could not do that?

Mr. HULBERT. No; but that is beside the question. When Hobson called for volunteers to go with him into Santiago Harbor it meant certain death, but more than the number required responded. The fires of true American patriotism never extinguish. But our service of that character has been predicated upon volunteer service.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULBERT. I will.

Mr. GORDON. Is the gentleman aware that the present regulations of the Army provide now, and always have, that no man shall go into the aviation service who does not volunteer for that purpose?

Mr. HULBERT. Then why are you amending the law?

Mr. GORDON. I am not amending it; I want the gentleman to understand. I am opposed to that provision.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There are 30 men on the ground for every 1 aviator, and so this provision applies to men who are necessary around the camp?

Mr. HULBERT. I know that there are substantially 30 men required in order to keep in order three machines that are allowed to each flier.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. True. And the gentleman knows that no commander would order an untrained man to a flying machine.

Mr. HULBERT. I do not know what the commanders might do. From some experience I have had, I find, like Congressmen, there are those who might do anything.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the very natural trend of mind that would make the House at first blush inclined to favor the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT]. But it seems to me before we record ourselves as of that opinion we ought to take some notice of what we have done about the same subject already and be careful that we do not reverse ourselves, perhaps, in our attitude toward this phase of the legislation relating to the Aviation Service.

Now, if the gentleman from New York has not refreshed his memory in that regard, I will call his attention to what might be called the organic act establishing the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps, which in the form in which we get it in the document room is labeled "Public No. 143, Sixty-third Congress," and was approved July 18, 1914. In section 2 of that act the gentleman will find this proviso:

Provided, That no person, except in time of war, shall be assigned or detailed against his will to duty as an aviation student or an aviation officer.

At that time, when that act was passed, this whole subject was considered, and it was then determined by the Congress that there might be such an emergency and exigency in time of war in which this authority should be given.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Was not every man to whom that applied a volunteer?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; on his entrance into the service.

Mr. LENROOT. At the time that act was passed?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He was a volunteer when he went into the Aviation Service, but he was not necessarily made a flier by going in. Now, I will follow out what the gentleman suggests by reading to him again from section 3, because from section 3 he will see that it does not apply necessarily to volunteers. The proviso in section 3 reads as follows:

Provided, That 12 enlisted men at a time shall, in the discretion of the officer in command of the Aviation Section, be instructed in the art of flying, and no enlisted man shall be assigned to duty as an aerial flier against his will except in time of war.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But at that time all men serving in the Regular Army were volunteers.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It does not destroy the principle that I am trying to enunciate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And there was no provision then for drafting or conscripting men.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand that. But the point remains simply this, that whether they were volunteering or had gone into the Aviation Section merely to stay on the ground, as the mechanicians do, when it came to a time of war the man had no option as to whether he would fly or not, but simply had to obey orders. Now, if we pass the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York we will practically upset the law that we passed when we had the whole matter under full consideration and decided upon an aviation policy for the service.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that notwithstanding that law, the War Department proceeded at once to enact regulations by the terms of which no person could be assigned to the Aviation Service unless he volunteered. That is the regulation to-day.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That does not affect the statute.

Mr. GORDON. It repeals the statute.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman insist that a departmental regulation can repeal a statute?

Mr. GORDON. In effect.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman is a lawyer, while I am not, but I know better than that.

Mr. GORDON. If that is true, would it not repeal that regulation that is now in force?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The only effect of it, as far as I can judge from a layman's viewpoint—the only effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York is to repeal this provision of the act of July 18, 1914. Departmental regulations have no statutory effect if they are afterwards modified by an act of Congress.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Has the gentleman noticed also that the amendment proposed would prevent sending a man into the air with a flier as an observer, or a photographer, or anything?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. Does not the gentleman see the distinction in the use of this word "draft," which is used for the purpose of getting this entire force of the Aviation Section in the Signal Corps? It has no more application to these men than that those men should be a part of the men who, under some circumstances, might be drafted, and 1 out of 20 of those men might, under some circumstances, be required to be a flier; but the regulations would still be in force which would prevent them from being ordered to fly unless they agreed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds, I will ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto shall close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. KAHN. I desire five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. And I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. DENT. Then make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes, 5 minutes to be used by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and 5 minutes by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, does that include all debate on amendments to this section?

Mr. DENT. Yes. The request covered amendments.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have an amendment on which I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. It included the section and the amendments.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to have five minutes on this amendment of mine. I do not know that I shall use it all.

Mr. DENT. Then, Mr. Chairman, make it 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I heartily favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT]. I believe it ought to be adopted. There is no practical reason that I know of against it. Gen. Squier, the head of this Signal Corps, testified before our committee that the department would not draft men for this service anyway. Now, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], who has just spoken, had something to say about maintaining the consistency of the War Department on this draft proposition. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this draft provision is not consistent with the one that was adopted in the bill which became a law on May 18, because that left no discretion with the War Department, but was mandatory as to all additional troops outside of the existing organizations, and required a draft to be put into effect immediately, while this leaves it optional with the Signal Corps.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, my colleague does not mean to misquote me. I may have misstated what I intended to say. I did not argue for maintaining consistency on the part of the War Department. Heaven knows I am not concerned about that. I argue for the consistency of Congress.

Mr. GORDON. That is what I am talking about, too. I insist that this provision is inconsistent with the provision which was adopted by the House in the bill to increase the Military Establishment, which became a law May 18, because that law contains a mandatory provision requiring the men to be drafted, and there is no option given to the War Department. I remember very distinctly that some of us made quite a fight for a provision that would have given an opportunity for voluntary enlistment. We had a very considerable debate upon that question on the floor of the House, if my memory serves correctly, and we were defeated upon the proposition.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Rolled!

Mr. GORDON. Yes. Now, reference has been made to the act of July, 1914; but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in that act the provision for drafting applied only to the drafting of the organized forces of the National Guard into the Federal service. It did not provide for drafting private citizens, as the act of May 18 does and as this act does. Furthermore, this is wholly and entirely unnecessary, for the reason that section 2 of this bill contains a provision authorizing the transfer from all the military forces of the United States into this service, and unlimited authority is given for such transfer.

The only argument that I know of against the adoption of this amendment is the testimony of Gen. Squier that the department would not make use of the draft provision in obtaining fliers anyway. Of course it would not. Any man of common sense knows that for so highly technical and hazardous a service as that you do not want any drafted men. You only want men who volunteer for the service, because they are subjected to the most critical physical and mental examination of any branch of the military service.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not my colleague feel that this is a pretty fine hair to undertake to split—that there is not very much to it when you get right down to it?

Mr. GORDON. Oh, I think there is considerable to it. Of course, as a practical proposition my judgment is that no competent man would ever think of invoking the draft proposition to obtain men for this service. I hope we will never have any but competent men at the head of the Signal Corps. We certainly have a competent man there now. The only argument I know of against the adoption of this amendment is that Gen. Squier says they would not draft anybody for this service anyhow. But why should not Congress itself enact a plain provision of law that will make it certain? As the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] says, we ought to maintain our consistency, and we ought not to confer authority that we think ought not to be conferred and that ought not to be used.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. As my colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD] asked my colleague [Mr. HULBERT], suppose men do not volunteer, then what will become of the Aviation Service?

Mr. GORDON. Then it ought to be abandoned. [Laughter.] The present regulations of the Army prohibit detailing men to this service now. And I will just say, in that connection, that that is my judgment about the whole service as far as fighting in Europe is concerned. I do not want any conscripted man to fight for me in Europe, and I do not think that this country is so hard up that it has to depend upon conscripted men in any branch of the foreign service. But in this branch especially we ought not to draft men.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT]. As the House knows, I supported the selective-draft act to the best of my ability. I believed it was right then; I believe it is right now; but I do not believe that the House of Representatives ought to go upon record—as it will if it votes this amendment down—that we are willing to stand for the conscription of aviators. An aviator is very different from a man in the Infantry or a man in the Cavalry. To fly requires altogether different qualifications. It requires nerve, bravery, and those things that can not be acquired, because each man has got to be his own boss and must act on his own initiative, and as one Member I do not want to say, by voting against this amendment, that I am willing to have the War Department go and take a clerk out of a store, who has no qualifications for this very dangerous service, and say, "We are going to make you fly whether you will or not."

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is the element of danger, then, an objection to drafting men?

Mr. LENROOT. In this sense, yes——

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Which is the more dangerous——

Mr. LENROOT. I will not yield further. I am going to answer the gentleman's question. Of course the man who is qualified undergoes a certain hazard and a certain danger, but the man who has not the qualifications to fly is in a hundredfold greater danger than is the man who has the qualifications.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I decline to yield. The gentleman from New York asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] what would happen if there were no volunteers. In reply to that suggestion I will say that if there are no volunteers it will probably be because of one very good reason, a reason which was shown to exist in the aviation scandal at San Diego two or three years ago, for Members who read the testimony in the court-martial of Col. Goodyear will recollect how men were crippled for life because they were forced to go into the air with defective machines and because of the incompetency of the officers who were in charge of that school. If they will recall that testimony, they will not vote for the conscription of aviators.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman has just employed the words "forced into the air," and yet all these men, as he reminded me, were volunteers.

Mr. LENROOT. I am not objecting to any man who volunteers in the United States service volunteering for all purposes. I am not objecting so far as the volunteers in the Signal Corps are concerned that they shall be subject to the orders of their superior officers to put them where they choose, but that is a different question from where you employ a draft and say that a man shall go into the air whether he will or not, or whether he has any qualifications or not for that service.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Suppose a man is ordered to go up as an observer and report what he sees?

Mr. LENROOT. If he is an observer, he is not an aviator, so he does not come within the terms of this amendment. The War Department recognizes this by having a regulation that no man shall be compelled to fly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. In conclusion I want to say that you are asking the House of Representatives to go on record as forcing men into the air to fly when the War Department themselves say they will not do so. If the time shall come when there are not a sufficient number of volunteers, then Congress should provide for some selection of qualified men, but we should not resort to the draft for airmen now.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this section does not force anybody to go into the air to fly. The War Department has never forced anybody into the air to fly and, as I understand it, it will not be the policy of the department now to do anything of that kind. But there are in this country to-day some men who own their own machines who are fliers, whose services possibly would be needed by the country. If they did not volunteer and their services were necessary for the success of our arms, ought we not to be able to command their services even in the air?

People speak of the extra hazardous character of the service. I agree that it is extra hazardous; but in war the infantryman, the artilleryman, the cavalryman, is frequently called upon to perform a duty at times which means almost certain death. Are we going to say that no general shall be allowed to give an order that will jeopardize the life of any soldier? In all wars such sacrifices have to be made constantly.

I do not think that this draft of aviators will ever be put into effect. I do not think the War Department will ever have occasion to use it, but if the occasion should arise the law should allow them to use it.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want the gentleman to puncture, if he will, the claim made by the gentleman from Wisconsin that men would be brought from behind the counter and sent up in flying machines.

Mr. KAHN. Of course that will never be done. The examination for aviators is so severe that probably only one man in five hundred can be utilized as a flyer. The gentleman from Wisconsin said that a man has to have nerve. I take the opposite view. He must have no nerves at all. [Laughter.] He must be able to stand anything without a particle of nervousness.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. How would the Government obtain the services of these aviators? The gentleman says they might be unwilling to enter the service. Could the President reach out individually and seize him and put him into the service?

Mr. KAHN. There has been an amendment prepared which will provide for that to the effect that they shall be drafted under the provisions of the draft law. But in this entire matter the Government in its stress ought to be able to get men to do any character of service that is required during this war. [Applause.] Only a few men of the proposed force are aviators. The great majority of the men in this force are mechanicians, and they will probably be taken from the ranks of the drafted men constituting the so-called National Army. That is what the word "draft" in this section undoubtedly refers to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. All time has expired except five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the Fitzgerald amendment the following proviso:
"Provided further, That no person so drafted shall be assigned to service as an aviator without his consent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HULBERT) there were 29 ayes and 56 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 23, after the word "draft," insert "in the manner provided by the act to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States approved May 18, 1917."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss this unless it meets with disapproval on the part of the committee. I have shown the amendment to the leaders on the Democratic side and to some on this side of the House. It simply provides that the draft, if made, shall be made in the same manner as under the selective-draft act.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The selective-draft act is by lot. If you want to get the specially skilled aviators that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] told us about, you could not get them under that act.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In response to that suggestion, let me say that I presume a great many men will be gathered in the aviation sections from the personnel of other arms of the service. Those things are usually done, as, for instance, artificers; you get them from the ranks of the Regular Army and National Guard by men being assigned to this particular duty. But if you are to make a draft under this act, draw a large number of men, perhaps mounting into the thousands, you ought to do it in a fair and equitable manner, and it occurs to me that we ought to employ more definite language.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I think there is a good deal in the suggestion of the gentleman that this language in its general terms would make this section somewhat indefinite, but I also think there is a good deal in the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON]. I suggest to the gentleman, and I would have no objection to such an amendment, that he use the language "under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the President."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Does the act of May 18, 1917, provide for selection of these men by lot, or is that done under regulations issued by the President?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is true.

Mr. FERRIS. That act itself provides for regulations.

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman will excuse me for taking part of his time, I would like to make this suggestion: The Secretary of War informed me, and the Chief Signal Officer informed the committee, that they did not propose to form this service except by the volunteer service.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think that is true; but so long as the draft is in there, we ought to prescribe some limits within which it shall be exercised.

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman would change his amendment in the way I suggest, I would agree to accept it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It has been suggested that the original draft act provides that rules and regulations can be prescribed from time to time. Would that cover it, in the gentleman's judgment?

Mr. DENT. It might, but this is the shorter form. You would not have to look for another law in order to determine what this law means.

Mr. LENROOT. If that is done, you might take them all out of New York City.

Mr. DENT. That is true.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Suppose you want 100,000 men. There ought to be some regularity over the country by which you can get those men. If this bill becomes the law in its present form, the draft can be made by the President in any way he desires and from any section of the country exclusively. For instance, if 100,000 men were called in all, they might all be called from the State of New York or from some particular part of the country. The selective feature is entirely absent. Instead of a fair imposition of the military burden upon all the people pro rata, we would substitute any system, however unfair and unjust and arbitrary, that the President might seek to impose. The word "draft" as used here means "a method of military conscription; a levy." This act, not connected in any way, unless by this amendment, with the selective conscription act, must be construed according to the ordinary meaning of its language; therefore it is evident it substitutes the arbitrary will of the President for the system we have heretofore adopted in the selective conscription act. Under it the military officers may go to mill or factory or farm and pick whom they choose, without any explanation or reason, and compel their immediate service. The man on one side of the street may be taken and the one on the other side excused; the mechanics in one institution or workshop may be called and those in another similar institution or workshop be permitted to stay at home. There are here no exemptions, as in the selective draft act; no one is exempt in this act, even though he be a minister of the gospel. Absolute and unlimited power is here given, to be exercised as one man may designate. This act ought to be perfected by the adoption of the amendment I have proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on the amendment proposed to the committee amendment by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That officers detailed in or attached to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps may, when qualified therefor, be rated as junior military aviators, military aviators, junior military aeronauts, and military aeronauts, but no person shall be so rated until there shall have been issued to him a certificate to the effect that he is qualified for the rating, and no certificate shall be issued to any person until an examining board, which shall be composed of two officers of experience of the aviation section of the Signal Corps and one medical officer, shall have examined him under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War and published to the Army by the War Department, and shall have reported him to be qualified for the rating. No person shall receive the rating of military aviator or military aeronaut until he shall have served creditably for three years as an aviation officer with the rating of a junior military aviator or the rating of a junior military aeronaut, except that in time of war any officer or enlisted man who specially distinguishes himself in active service may, upon recommendation of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, be rated as a junior military aviator, military aviator, junior military aeronaut, or military aeronaut without regard to examination or to length of service: Provided, That junior military aeronauts and military aeronauts shall be entitled to the same increase in rank and pay as are now authorized by law for junior military aviators and military aviators, respectively: Provided further, That any officer attached to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps for any military duty requiring him to make regular and frequent flights shall receive an increase of 25 per cent of the pay of his grade and length of service under his commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 11, after the word "officer," insert the words "or enlisted man."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before an enlisted man is given detail as a junior military aviator he has to be appointed as an officer, has he not?

Mr. DENT. He has to be appointed.

Mr. MANN. As an officer?

Mr. DENT. Oh, no; they use enlisted men for flying purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 16 and 17, after the word "service," strike out the words "as an aviation officer or nautical officer."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Directing his attention to lines 1 and 2, page 5, I beg to inquire if it is not intended by the provisions of the bill to provide that the examining board should be composed of two officers who have had experience in aviation?

Mr. DENT. The bill reads:

Which shall be composed of two officers of experience of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps and one medical officer.

Mr. HULBERT. My inquiry is whether it is not intended that the two officers of the examining board other than the medical officer shall be experienced in aviation?

Mr. DENT. I think that is what the language means.

Mr. HULBERT. No; it does not mean anything of the kind.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman suggest something different?

Mr. HULBERT. I suggest that you strike out the words "experience of" and after the word "section," in the same line, insert the words "experienced in aviation," so that the clause will read:

Which shall be composed of two officers of the Aviation Section experienced in aviation.

Otherwise officers might be transferred from the Cavalry and the Infantry and detailed to duty in the Aviation Section, and you might have men on this board who have been of long service in the Infantry or Cavalry Arm, but who, by reason of that fact, might not be able to give the same consideration to a man only a short time in the service who had performed great deeds of daring in the aviation section and yet not get the recognition to which he is entitled.

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman will permit me, I do not see how he improves it by his language, because a man can not have experience in the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps without being commissioned in that line.

Mr. HULBERT. Let me ask the gentleman if there are not now officers in the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps who have never been up in a flying machine in their lives, and whether the gentleman will say that those gentlemen are not experienced in aviation when they have been detailed for six months or a year to that particular section.

Mr. DENT. There are lots of men in the Signal Corps who have not had experience as fliers, but this refers to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps.

Mr. KAHN. There are a great many officers in the allied aviation sections who have never flown.

Mr. HULBERT. The point I am getting at is whether or not it is intended the two officers who compose in part this board are to be men who have had experience as aviators or not.

Mr. DENT. That is the way I construe the language, and I think that is what is meant.

Mr. HULBERT. Well, I submit to the gentleman I do not believe it means anything of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the last committee amendment in the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 20, after the word "aviators," insert the following: "and military aviators, respectively."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to propose an amendment: On page 5, line 2, strike out the words "experience of," and after the words "Signal Corps," in line 3, insert "who are experienced as aviators.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 2, after the word "of," strike out the words "experience of," and in line 3, after the word "Corps," insert the words "who are experienced as aviators."

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HULBERT) there were—ayes 6, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That authority is hereby given to the President, through the War Department, for the purchase, manufacture, maintenance, repair, and operation of airships and other aerial machines, including instruments and appliances of every sort and description necessary for the operation, construction, or equipment of all types of aircraft, including guns, armament, ammunition, and all necessary spare parts and equipment connected therewith; and all necessary buildings for equipment and personnel in the Aviation Section and for the exclusive purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger and equipment carrying vehicles which may be necessary for the Aviation Section.

And authority is hereby further given for the establishment, equipment, maintenance, and operation of aviation stations, including (a) the acquisition of land, or any interest, in land with any buildings and improvements thereon, by purchase, lease, donation, condemnation, or otherwise; (b) the improvement of such land by clearing, grading, draining, seeding, and otherwise making the same suitable for the purpose intended; (c) the construction, maintenance, and repair of permanent or temporary barracks, quarters, hospitals, mess houses, administration, instructional and recreational buildings, hangars, magazines, storehouses, sheds, shops, garages, boathouses, docks, wireless stations, laboratories, observation stations, and all other buildings and structures necessary or advisable; (d) procuring and introducing water, electric light and power, telephones, telegraph, and sewerage to aviation stations and buildings and structures thereon by the extension of existing systems or the creation of new systems and their maintenance, operation and repair, installation of plumbing, electric fixtures and telephones, fire apparatus and fire alarm systems and the maintenance, operation and repair of all such systems, fixtures, and apparatus; (e) construction and repair of roads, walks, sea walls, breakwaters, bridges and wharves, dredging, filling and otherwise improving land and water sites; (f) purchase of stoves and other cooking and heating apparatus, kitchen and table ware, and furniture and equipment for kitchens, mess halls, officers' quarters, barracks, hospitals, and other buildings, screens, lockers, refrigerators, and all other necessary equipment; (g) purchase of gasoline, oil, fuel, and all supplies of every kind and character necessary or advisable for maintenance and operation of aviation stations, including electric light and power, telephones, water supply and sewerage service; (h) purchase and manufacture and installation of all kinds of machinery, tools, material, supplies, and equipment for construction, maintenance, and repair of aircraft, buildings, and improvements at aviation stations, or property or appliances used in connection with aviation.

And also for the purchase or manufacture and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes.

And also for the actual and necessary expenses of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees of the Army and authorized agents sent on special duty at home and abroad for aviation purposes, including observation and investigation of foreign military operations and organization, manufacture of aircraft and engines, also special courses in foreign aviation schools and manufacturing establishments, to be paid upon certificates of the Secretary of War certifying that the expenditures were necessary for military purposes.

And also for vocational training, including employment of necessary civilian instructors in important trades related to aviation, purchase of tools, equipment, materials, and machines required for such training, purchase of textbooks, books of references, scientific and professional papers, periodicals, and magazines, and instruments and material for theoretical and practical instruction at aviation schools and stations, and all other means to carry out the provisions of section 27 of the act approved June 3, 1916, authorizing, in addition to the military training of soldiers while in active service, means for securing educational and vocational training of a character to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations.

And also paying and otherwise providing for such officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps and such enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps as may be called into active service and such enlisted men as may be enlisted in the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps under the provisions of section 2 of the act to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, approved May 18, 1917, or any subsequent act temporarily increasing the commissioned or enlisted personnel of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps and such civilian employees as may be necessary, for the payment of their traveling and other necessary expenses when not traveling with troops, and for the necessary expenses of the aircraft production board: Provided, That hereafter all reserve officers and enlisted men of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps shall be paid by Quartermaster Corps disbursing officers from funds transferred to their credit from Signal Corps appropriations.

And also for the payment of all expenses in connection with the development of suitable types of aviation engines, airplanes, and other aircraft appurtenances, including the cost of sample engines, airplanes, and appurtenances, cost of any patents and other rights therein, and costs of investigation, experimentation, and research in respect thereto.

And also for the payment of all expenses in connection with the creation, expansion, acquisition, and development of plants, factories, and establishments for the manufacture of airplanes, aircraft, engines, and appurtenances, including provision for the purchase or lease of land, with the buildings thereon, construction of permanent or temporary buildings for all purposes, purchase of machinery, tools, and employment of operatives, together with all administrative expenses necessary, the purchase and supply of raw and semifinished materials and of fuel and all other things necessary for creating and extending the production of airplanes, aircraft, engines, and all appurtenances.

And also for creating, maintaining, and operating at technical schools and colleges courses of instruction for aviation students, including cost of instruction, equipment, and supplies necessary for instruction and subsistence of students while receiving such instruction.

And also for organization, administrative and contingent expenses in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including chief clerks and seven principal clerks, chiefs of divisions, and such other services as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, office rents, office furniture and equipment, stationery, plans, drawings, photographs, photograph materials and equipment, and all other necessary office supplies and expenses.

Provided, That motor-propelled vehicles, airplanes, engines, parts thereof, and appurtenances may be exchanged in part payment for new equipment of the same or similar character to be used for the same purpose as those proposed to be exchanged.

Provided further, That during the present emergency officers and enlisted men of foreign armies attached to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps as instructors or inspectors, when traveling on official business pertaining to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps, shall be authorized, from funds appropriated in this act, the same mileage and transportation allowances as are authorized for officers or enlisted men of the Regular Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee can expedite the matter by disposing of the various committee amendments to this section first unless some Member has an amendment to some committee amendment. Therefore the Chair will direct the committee amendments to be disposed of, and then the entire section is open for amendment. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 2, after the word "section" and beginning with the word "and," strike out all the language to and including the word "section," in line 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation, through the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, of all motor-propelled passenger and equipment carrying vehicles which may be necessary for the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 21, after the word "docks," strike out the word "wireless" and insert in lieu thereof the word "radio."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 1, after the word "also," strike out the word "paying" and insert in lieu thereof the word "to pay"; and after the word "otherwise," strike out the word "providing" and insert in lieu thereof the word "provide."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 14, after the word "troops," strike out the words "and for the necessary expenses of the aircraft production board."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 19, after the word "expenses," strike out the following: "in the District of Columbia and elsewhere."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 20, after the word "including," insert the word "one," and after the word "chief" strike out the word "clerks" and insert the word "clerk," and after the word "clerk" strike out the word "and."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, after the word "that," insert the following: "subject to the approval of the Secretary of War."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 10, after the word "traveling," insert the words "in the United States."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 12, after the word "appropriated," strike out the word "in" and insert in lieu thereof the word "by."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 15, insert as a new section section 10——

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, on page 7, line 13, I ask unanimous consent that the comma after the word "interest" be transposed to the word "land," the second word from that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 13, after the word "interest," strike out the comma and insert it after the word "land."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Page 9, line 14, in the word "references" the "s" should be stricken out. It should be in the singular.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 14, strike out the letter "s" in the word "references."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 18, after the word "that," insert "during the existing emergency," and on page 7, line 10, after the word "and," insert the words "during the existing emergency."

Mr. LENROOT. If I may have the attention of the chairman, I do not care to discuss this. I understood it was acceptable to him.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want a minute or two for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] a question, and before asking the question I will make a brief statement. I believe that this bill is of vast importance. I believe the projects embodied in it are of supreme importance at the moment, and possibly may bring to a speedy conclusion the most hideous war in all history. Therefore I am cordially in favor of it.

I believe, moreover, it is very desirable that we should avail ourselves of every possible opportunity not only to expedite the construction of these machines here but to get as many of them as possible elsewhere, and believing that, I have thought of offering an amendment to this bill authorizing the Secretary of War in his discretion, if he found after investigation that the Governments of Great Britain, France, and Italy could, by receiving a share of this appropriation, increase their own output of machines beyond what they will be able to make without the appropriation, to buy airplanes in those countries and from any available source.

Mr. DENT. I do not believe there is any question but that the Secretary of War would have that authority.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sure about that. I do not think the Secretary has that authority, and I do not think we ought to pay the expense of these foreign armies. We are lending them money they can use for that purpose.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have not yielded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] must have misunderstood the question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. My idea is this: I want to buy machines as rapidly as possible. I believe we can get more machines for a given amount of money in Europe than in this country. We ought to get them there when we can, and make them here, too. We want them in large quantities, and quickly.

Mr. DENT. That is what I thought the gentleman was driving at.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And I believe if we can do so, and get them more quickly, by getting some of them on the other side, we can avoid the hazard of trans-Atlantic carriage and danger of having them destroyed by submarines, we ought to do it. It is not important as to where these machines are made. The question of American labor is of secondary importance when it comes to saving American lives and winning the war as rapidly as possible. And if we learn after investigation that Great Britain or France or Italy or any other of our allies can increase their output of these machines we ought to buy them.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. You can buy them under this bill, can you not?

Mr. DENT. Perhaps I misunderstood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] when I answered as positively as I did. The idea, as I gathered from the gentleman's statement, is whether or not under this bill we could proceed, not only in this country but also in England or France, in order to expedite the organization of this corps and the building of machines?

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is it, exactly.

Mr. DENT. There is no question about that, and that is what I intended to say.

Mr. SLAYDEN. You think there is no doubt about that?

Mr. DENT. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am glad to hear it; and I hope, if the Secretary of War finds that he can get machines anywhere in larger numbers, he will proceed to do it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I want to take a moment to explain the amendment I have offered and which the chairman of the committee accepted.

Section 9, as it stands, is permanent legislation, and its powers will exist after the war. The amendment I have proposed to certain places makes the powers of section 9 in force only during the existing emergency.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. There are two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SABATH). Were there two amendments?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. They were all in one, and were both adopted.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MORGAN: Page 7, line 14, after the word "otherwise," insert a colon and the following words:

"Provided, That, by order of the President, any unappropriated or reserved public land may be reserved from entry and designated and used for such aviation stations."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I have called the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and also the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], the ranking Republican member of said committee, to the amendment which I have offered. I do not believe they have any objection to the adoption of my amendment. It is probable, Mr. Chairman, that under the general law the President would have authority to set aside any portion of the public domain to be used for military purposes which would, of course, include the use of such lands for aviation training stations. To avoid any question about the matter there can be no harm in inserting this provision. The amendment authorizes the President by Executive order to reserve from entry and to designate and use any unappropriated or reserved public land for aviation stations. These stations are to be permanent. It will require the expenditure of three-quarters of a million of dollars to erect the necessary buildings and equipment for one of these stations. There should be no question, therefore, about the authority of the President to set apart any of the public lands to be used as permanent aviation stations.

Mr. Chairman, I have been prompted to present this amendment by the situation in my own congressional district. In the county of Alfalfa, in the eighth Oklahoma district, which I have the honor to represent in this House, there is what is known as the Saline Reserve. It is sometimes called the Salt Plains. It embraces something like 50,000 acres of land, according to my memory. It is something like 15 miles in length and from 6 to 10 miles in width. It is a level tract of land upon which there are no buildings, trees, or other obstructions. There is no vegetation on this land owing to the salt water which is near the surface of the land. In the opinion of some good judges it is an ideal location for an aviation training station. It is located near the city of Cherokee, the growing county seat of Alfalfa County. The city has a population of something like 3,000. It is a city with all modern improvements, with electric lights, water works, and with three railroads. Alfalfa County is one of the best agricultural counties in the State of Oklahoma, or, for that matter, in any State of the Union. The people of the county, including, of course, the city of Cherokee, are intelligent, progressive, and patriotic. Nowhere else could there be better surroundings for the training of men who we believe are to play such an important part in winning the war in which this country is now engaged. The wide-awake Commercial Club of the city of Cherokee, through its secretary, W. E. Wiles, has made a formal application to the War Department to have one of the aviation training stations established on the Saline Reservation to which I have referred. Should this bill which appropriates $640,000,000 for aviation purposes become a law—and we all recognize that it will become a law—I am informed that a large number of aviation training stations will be established in various parts of the United States. Before establishing any of these stations the War Department will thoroughly investigate all proposed locations. I do not know what will be the result of the investigation of the Saline Reservation in Oklahoma. This location must take its chances with others. However, I think it is wise to adopt my amendment so that there can be no question but what the War Department may utilize this reservation or any other public lands in the Western States for aviation-training stations.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that the President would have that authority anyhow, but I can not see any possible objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not wish to take up the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether in the consideration of this bill his committee took up at all the matter of the bill on which some hearings had been had for the creation of a separate department of aeronautics?

Mr. DENT. I will state that the committee did not. They thought that ought to be considered separately and independently of this particular proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FITZGERALD: On page 11 strike out lines 16 to 25, inclusive.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph has already been amended by the adoption of the committee amendment striking out the words "in the District of Columbia and elsewhere." This is the authority to expend out of the appropriation money for rent, clerical service, office furniture, and the like.

Under date of July 12 the War Department transmitted estimates to Congress aggregating $5,854,000, and they set forth the specific purposes for which the money is required. For additional employees in the War Department they ask $3,726,000; for contingent expenses, $820,000; for stationery, $550,000; for rent of buildings, $196,000; for printing and binding, $374,000. These estimates will be taken up, and specific appropriations will be made for those services in a bill the consideration of which is to begin on Monday.

It seems to me that the money in this present bill should be devoted exclusively to the purposes of paying for the aircraft, the buildings, the plants, the subsistence, and the pay and equipment of the officers and men in the Aviation Corps, and the money for the departmental services should be segregated, as it is always segregated from such appropriations. Unless specific authority be given to spend the money for rent and clerical services in the District of Columbia, the appropriation is not available for that purpose.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DENT. As I understood the gentleman to-day in discussing the bill, he made the statement that if the committee amendment striking out the words "in the District of Columbia" be adopted in this bill, no money could be paid for clerical hire in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the other purposes enumerated, however—stationery and office furniture—the money would be available. I do not believe the gentleman desires to mix up this appropriation with such items. I believe the paragraph should go out, so that the money can be specifically carried elsewhere.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman says he expects to report a deficiency bill that will take care of this paragraph. Under those circumstances I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That for the purpose of carrying this act into effect the sum of $640,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise specially appropriated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will agree to strike out the word "specially" there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FITZGERALD: Page 12, line 18, after the word "appropriated," insert the words "to be available until June 30, 1918."

Mr. FITZGERALD. The period after the word "appropriated" should be stricken out and a comma should be inserted in lieu thereof.

I assume, Mr. Chairman, that it is the purpose to expend the money within the fiscal year, but in the event it is not expended, inasmuch as it is not for the fiscal year, the covering-in act would not apply if the money be not expended during this fiscal year.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman suggest the words "immediately available"?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. It is not to be made immediately available. It is to be available until June 30, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "specially" in line 17, page 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Amend, page 12, line 17, by striking out the word "specially."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments——

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman withhold that motion to allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 12, line 16, strike out $640,000,000 and insert in lieu thereof $320,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, this morning's Washington Post was an eye opener to me. Just yesterday we were assured the steel men had surrendered to the Government and were going to be content with fair profits under prices fixed by the Government. And now comes the statement from Gen. Goethals that he has let contracts, not that he is negotiating, but that he has contracted for 642,800 tons of steel ships at $158 per ton, and 1,218,000 tons of wooden ships at $143 per ton. This is surrender by the steel interests with a vengeance. The Philadelphia Inquirer of same date, which I read later, has this article, which includes a letter from Gen. Goethals:

WASHINGTON, July 13.

Maj. Gen. Goethals, manager of the Shipping Board's emergency fleet corporation, took full charge of the Government's shipbuilding program to-day and announced sweeping plans for constructing the great merchant fleet with which the United States hopes to defeat the German submarine campaign.

The most important steps contemplated by Gen. Goethals are these:

Immediate construction of two Government-owned shipbuilding plants for building 400 fabricated steel ships of 2,500,000 tonnage.

Commandeering of 1,500,000 tons of shipping now building for private account in American yards.

A request for another great appropriation for building ships.

Gen. Goethals's announcement was made in a letter to Chairman Denman, of the Shipping Board, which said the fleet corporation, under powers just granted by President Wilson, would start on its building program Monday by offering contracts for construction of the two Government ship plants and by outlining to shipbuilders the plans for commandeering vessels under construction.

STATEMENT BY MR. DENMAN.

Chairman Denman, of the Shipping Board, who also is president and director of the corporation and whose friends had sought for him the powers conferred on the fleet corporation by the President, made this statement after receiving Gen. Goethals's letter:

"The board of directors of the fleet corporation will be called together probably Monday to discuss the General's program. I have no doubt the directors and the General will have no disagreement over policy on the program he has outlined for us when the matter has had full discussion."

Gen. Goethals's announcement and Denman's comment were regarded by the General's friends as indicating a final settlement in his favor of the long drawn-out controversy between the two men as to the policy to be pursued in building ships. Although the fleet corporation's board of directors is composed of members and employees of the shipping board, it was said to-night on the highest authority that the situation would be so arranged that Gen. Goethals can proceed without hindrance.

CONTRACTS NOW LET.

Gen. Goethals's letter to Mr. Denman discloses that the fleet corporation has let contracts for 425 ships, 345 of them wood and 77 steel, with a total tonnage of 1,860,800. The cost of the wooden ships will be $143 a ton and the steel ships $158.

Contracts for building the Government yards will be let Monday on a basis of cost plus 6 per cent. Options will be given to contractors to purchase the plants on completion of the work.

Proffers that have come to the fleet corporation for building completed ships, it was said to-day, show that steel ships can be built faster than wood. Steel ships complete, it is said, can be turned out within five months from the time work is begun, while wooden construction will require eight months.

Gen. Goethals's letter to Chairman Denman follows:

"Now that the President has authorized the emergency fleet corporation to exercise the powers granted by Congress to build and commandeer ships, I intend, on Monday, to start ship construction, which will complete my shipbuilding program. My full program is as follows:

"I. Ships now building:

"Contracts for 348 wood ships have been let or agreed upon, with a tonnage capacity of 1,218,000 tons, at a cost, completed, of approximately $174,000,000.

"In addition, I have under negotiation contracts for about 100 wood ships.

"Contracts for 77 steel ships have been let or agreed upon, with a tonnage of 642,800 tons, at a cost of approximately $101,660,356.

"There are thus provided 425 ships of all sorts, with an aggregate tonnage of 1,860,800, at a cost of approximately $275,000,000, besides 100 more wood ships under negotiation. I shall continue to let all contracts for wood ships (of design approved by the naval architect of the corporation), which I can secure from responsible bidders.

"II. Construction of standardized ships.

"My main reliance for getting the greatest amount of the most serviceable tonnage in the shortest time will be on the construction of fabricated steel ships of standard pattern. For that purpose I shall use to some extent the existing yards.

GOVERNMENT TO OWN PLANTS.

"On Monday I shall offer contracts for the building of two plants (to be owned by the Government) for the construction of fabricated steel ships to produce 400 ships of an aggregate tonnage capacity of 2,500,000 tons within the next 18 to 24 months. For the building of these two yards and the construction of ships in them, I shall offer, as compensation to the agents who undertake the work, a fee of approximately 6 per cent of the total cost of the work with rewards for savings in cost and for speed in delivery.

"Provision will be made for decreasing the fee to prevent unnecessary cost. The contracts will give the Government the benefit of Government-fixed commodity prices, and will provide for cessation of work at any time so that the appropriation may not be exceeded. Options will be given to the contractors to purchase the plants at arbitrated values on the completion of the work.

"The design of the ship is ready, the plans of the yards are ready, the distribution of the work of furnishing the material and of fabrication is arranged.

WILL CONSUME AVAILABLE MONEY.

"This part of the program will take all the $550,000,000 available, not absorbed by contracts made or making as stated in the beginning of this letter. The program will more than redeem my estimates to the congressional committee at the time this appropriation was asked for of 3,000,000 tons of new construction within 18 months.

"The additional contracts for wood ships which I expect to place, together with the full number of fabricated steel ships which it is planned to build, will require more money than Congress has authorized. When I know how much will be needed, it will be necessary to ask Congress for further sums.

"3. Commandeering of ships in yards:

"On Monday I shall deliver to ship builders a general statement of the program which I have long been maturing for commandeering ships now under construction for private account, such ships having an aggreate tonnage considerably in excess of 1,500,000 tons.

WILL FEDERALIZE YARDS.

"The essence of this program is to commandeer all such ships and expedite their construction by aiding labor and cutting out refinements. By this Federalizing each yard, giving it Government help and putting it on a speed basis, we shall produce its greatest efficiency. As fast as the berths are cleared each yard will be devoted to the production of a single type of tonnage for which it is best suited. I count upon the complete cooperation of the yards.

"This program is made competitive because expedition can not be obtained in a yard engaged partly on rush work and partly on prewar time schedules. My investigation has satisfied me that citizens of the United States and of our allies will pay the cost of expediting ships now building for them and take them off our hands. If this policy is adopted, it will conserve our fund.

"I agree that it is essential for the Shipping Board to requisition at once the neutral ships which are constructed and ready to sail. I have no data to make an estimate as to how many of these ships there are or how much money will be required for this purchase. I shall, therefore, cut my program to the extent of $50,000,000. Please notify me at once whether this is enough.

"Each day's delay in summer—in commandeering or contracting—means two days' loss of time in throwing the work into the winter months. It is for that reason I am urgent that the program start on Monday."

I look in vain for any comment or criticism of this enormous price being paid by Gen. Goethals for ships as announced, or the enormous commission to be paid to the "agents who undertake the work" of building two Government shipbuilding plants and the construction of ships in them, "with reward for savings in cost and speed in delivery." Just what the function, responsibilities, or outlay of these agents will be is not clear. The General will let the building of the two plants by contract and the Government will build the ships in the plants, so I presume these "agents who undertake the work" will only superintend and overlook the work.

In another paragraph of his letter the General states:

This part of the program—

The two plants and ships built in them—will take all of the $550,000,000 available not absorbed by the contracts made or making, as stated in the beginning of this letter.

That is to say, as I figure it, about $225,000,000. So these agents seem to me to be about to be awarded, without one dollar invested or risk assumed, a neat little sum of 6 per cent on $225,000,000, or about $13,500,000 for 18 months' supervision of a Government contract and job as commissions, besides "rewards for savings in cost and speedy delivery."

In the name of the Lord of Hosts and of the people of the United States, will not somebody offer Gen. Goethals "rewards for savings" somewhere in costs? Speed in delivery is all important, and the President wisely sought to place in charge of our shipbuilding the greatest genius in constructive and administrative ability in America. Naturally his eyes turned to Gen. Goethals, crowned with the laurals of victory in the greatest engineering achievement of the ages in building the Panama Canal.

But every step he has taken since he has been selected by the President to take charge of this ship building has seemed to me to be utterly reckless as to the expenditure of the millions of the people's money and prodigal in the bestowal of princely bounties on those with whom and through whom he deals in behalf of the Government. From the first he has acted as if he were supreme and sole director of the Nation's program of shipbuilding, and scorned the advise or cooperation of the Shipping Board, notwithstanding the law has placed the building or acquiring of ships for the Government in the hands of the Shipping Board, which was appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and of which Mr. Denman is chairman. I personally know that Mr. Denman is one of the best-posted men in the United States in regard to our merchant marine, and one of the strongest and ablest of men, and one whose soul is devoted to the discharge of his duty. The other members of the board are able men also; but Gen. Goethals acts as if there were no Shipping Board. Why he writes to Chairman Denman at all is a mystery, since he only writes to tell him what he, Goethals, has done. Perhaps the mystery is explained by the next to the last paragraph of his letter to the chairman, in which he confesses he has no data to determine how much money will be required to pay for neutral ships constructed and ready to sail, and rather curtly asks Mr. Denman to notify him at once whether $50,000,000, to which he says he has cut his program, is enough for that purpose. This is not the first time he has ignored the Shipping Board, which, in my judgment, knows far more than he about shipping. Before this he has been called down by a refusal of Chairman Denman to approve what seemed to me an outrageous price for steel. Somehow I understand that matter was adjusted, but that matter was a trivial one compared to the matter set forth in Gen. Goethal's letter which I have quoted.

I wish to revert to the prices which Gen. Goethals has agreed to pay for ship tonnage—$158 per ton for steel and $143 per ton for wooden ships, involving $275,000,000. Prior to August, 1914, ships were generally built, so the testimony showed before our Committee on Merchant Marine, in England at about $40 per ton and in this country at from $40 to $60 per ton; and the shipbuilders here professed that if they had a large quantity of ships to build they could do it at least, if the ships were standardized, as cheaply as England could. Now they are to be given a quantity of building, and that in the main to be standardized, far greater than ever England's shipyards built; and yet Gen. Goethals, right off the reel, contracts with them to pay a price four times the English ante bellum price and three times the American ante bellum price. Truly the steel men were wise to "surrender" to the Government, so far as shipbuilding is concerned, unless they are forbidden to take any of these shipbuilding contracts and compelled to furnish steel to those who get the contracts at reasonable prices, say $56 per ton—the price, as I recall it, at which Mr. Daniels required and compelled them to furnish steel for naval construction. If this shipbuilding program of Gen. Goethals does not lay the foundation for the greatest of all war grafts and war scandals in history, it is not what it seems to me.

Mr. DENT. Is it necessary for the committee to vote on the amendment to the title?

Mr. CRISP. No; that comes up in the House.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5326) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army, and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. DENT, by unanimous consent, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD show that there was no Member voting against the passage of the aeroplane bill.

The SPEAKER. Let the RECORD show it.

ADJOURNMENTS UNTIL JULY 23, 1917.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let us see if we can not extend the request.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to ask unanimous consent that when the House meets on Wednesday next it shall adjourn to meet on the following Saturday.

Mr. MANN. Why not make the request that the House adjourn to-day until Wednesday, and that when we meet Wednesday, after the approval of the Journal, we adjourn until Saturday, and that on Saturday, after the approval of the Journal, we adjourn until the following Monday?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will make that request all in one; that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday, and that after the reading and approval of the Journal on Wednesday the House adjourn to meet on Saturday following, and that after the reading and approval of the Journal on Saturday the House adjourn to meet on the following Monday at 12 o'clock.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I should like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina what can be done on Wednesday if we consent to the gentleman's request?

Mr. KITCHIN. Nothing can be done on Wednesday except to adjourn after the reading and approval of the Journal.

Mr. MANN. Nothing will be done unless some Member dies?

Mr. KITCHIN. Nothing.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Except to move to adjourn?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next——

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will allow me, assuming that this aviation bill should immediately pass the Senate, could there not be some arrangement by which the House without objection could send it to conference and dispose of it?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Senate will not take up this bill until after the food bill is passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet next Wednesday, and that after the reading and approval of the Journal on Wednesday the House shall adjourn until Saturday, and that after the reading and approval of the Journal on Saturday the House shall adjourn until Monday week at 12 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am getting quite a number of letters from home urging that Congress get busy and pass some laws, and I would like to know if there is anything for the House to do next week?

Mr. KITCHIN. There is nothing that the House can do; the gentleman's constituents are referring to the body at the other end of the Capitol. The House has done everything it was required to do up to now. [Applause.]

Mr. SEARS. The newspapers are giving the idea that the House is not doing anything.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the gentleman knows that that is not true.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Would it not be better not to provide for an adjournment in the future, as we might want to do something? It seems to me that you are exceeding the jurisdiction of the House, because the Constitution does not provide for an adjournment for only three days at a time. The gentleman is asking unanimous consent that the House when it adjourns next Wednesday adjourn to a future date.

Mr. KITCHIN. I see the point of the gentleman, and we will make it that way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. CROSSER. Reserving the right to object, the Patent Committee has a bill which we think of sufficient importance connected with the war, and we feel that if the House is going to adjourn substantially for a week we ought to have some understanding about getting the bill up when it goes into session again.

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe that there is something in the proposition contained in the resolution the gentleman refers to and that the House ought to consider it. I believe we will do it when we come back here on Monday, the 23d, and I will do what I can to get the bill up.

Mr. CROSSER. It will no take more than half an hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

UNVEILING OF THE STATUE OF SEQUOIA.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the addresses and proceedings in Statuary Hall at the unveiling of the statue of Sequoia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the addresses and proceedings in Statuary Hall at the unveiling of the statue of Sequoia Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I was not present on that occasion, and I would like to ask unanimous consent to print some remarks in the RECORD appropriate to that subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the aeroplane bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in reply to some observations made yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, does that include anything except the remarks of the gentleman himself?

Mr. GORDON. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the aeroplane bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the aviation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the aviation bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under its previous order, until Wednesday, July 18, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 16, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we unite our hearts in this Senate Chamber before Thee in our common prayer, asking for Thy blessing upon our land and country. Thou hast made this land very dear to our hearts—the land of our homes, the land of our loved ones, the land of our ideals and of our religion. We pray God's blessing upon our land in this time, where there has been forced upon us against our will, against our protest, against all justice and right, the necessity for an armed force for our national defense. We pray that we may realize that all the mighty forces of justice and truth are in league with us for the accomplishment of our great national destiny. Lead us on, O God of our fathers, to the completion of the work that Thou has committed to our hands. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday, July 12, 1917, was read and approved.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quroum.

Mr. OWEN, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. MCKELLAR entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] are detained on important business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is detained on official business.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is detained on important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 5405) making appropriations for certain session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

OIL LAND LEASES (S. DOC. NO. 63).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of April 16, 1917, certain information relative to the number of leases of lands of the Osage Indians in the State of Oklahoma, issued or authorized since the 1st day of January, 1916, and the area embraced therein, etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

APPROPRIATION FOR AVIATION.

A message from the House, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5326) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

H. R. 5326. An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this morning I saw what purported to be some news, to the effect that when the aeronautical bill came from the House the leaders in the Senate had expressed a hope that they would get it through by the 1st of August. I wish to express the hope that we shall not waste all that time in getting it through. Apropos of that, I wish to have read at the desk an editorial from the Washington Post in this morning's issue.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

MAKE IT UNANIMOUS.

Reports are current that the airplane appropriation bill will be delayed in the Senate by legislators who are curious to know all the details regarding the stupendous plan for taking command of the air and by others who are anxious to establish a department of aviation instead of leaving the creation of the air fleet to the Regular Army. It is to be hoped that these reports are not true.

There is no good reason for delay in the Senate. The details surrounding the air fleet plans can not be given to Senators. These details are not needed in order to pass upon the desirability of the legislation, while, if discussed even behind closed doors, there would be a chance that Germany would hear of them. All that Germany should know is that the United States is moving on a colossal scale to annihilate her and that nothing will prevent the catastrophe except surrender. As Mr. MANN pithily suggested, Germany should first learn our plans on the field of battle.

As for a department of aviation, it is not only unnecessary but would be a mischief making addition to the national war machine. Airplanes are war implements; nothing more. They can be used in cooperation with military or naval forces or mixed. At this stage of their development they are auxiliary to military or naval forces, and should be under the direction of the military or naval commander in charge of operations. The time may come when an airplane army will be paramount and land or water forces secondary in importance; if so, that will be the proper time to establish a department of aviation. At this time a separate aviation department would necessarily divide authority and create friction between fighting forces. That would be assistance to the enemy.

The air fleet contemplated by the pending bill is a magnificent project, which, if developed with secrecy and dispatch and operated with diligence, will change the course of the world and confer a blessing upon all mankind. The Senate has an opportunity to share with the House in a gloriously patriotic feat, worthy of the traditions of this imperishable free Nation. Let it pass the bill unanimously, and at once, so that the conquering arrows shall fly to their target with eagle speed. Let the Senate place in the President's hands these mighty millions of power and energy, to be translated into victory by American genius and American valor.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution passed by the Grand Igloo, Pioneers of Alaska, on April 23, 1917, which will be incorporated in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolution.

To the President of the United States and the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Whereas there was before the Sixty-fourth Congress H. R. 17499, generally known as the Alexander bill, and a similar measure will be introduced this session, by the terms of which the power of the Territorial legislature to tax the canneries is taken away from said Territorial legislature and the title of fish-trap sites in the Territorial waters is given in perpetuity to locators, and the limitation of said legislature to amend, alter, or modify the Federal laws regulating fisheries are further confined:

Therefore the Grand Igloo, Pioneers of Alaska, in convention assembled, condemn said Alexander bill or any similar measure that may be introduced, for the reason that the canneries are a rightful subject of taxation of said Territory, and the granting of fishery sites in perpetuity fosters monopoly and will place a tax through such monopolization on posterity, and further because the people of Alaska, through their legislature, is in a far better position, through understanding the local conditions and being able to act more quickly, to correct abuses that are now destroying our salmon fisheries;

And we further recommend that no law be enacted by the Congress that will allow any corporation or individual to divest the Territory of a just control in the great resources by monopolizing the same, depriving local fishing interests from multiplying and expanding; and we urgently request that the open waters of Alaska do continuously remain common property for common use, and subject only to Federal and Territorial control.

And your memorialists do most respectfully and earnestly pray that H. R. 17499, purporting to be for the protection, regulation, and conservation of the fisheries of Alaska, and generally known as the Alexander bill, do not pass.

Passed the Grand Igloo, Pioneers of Alaska, April 23, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a copy of resolutions adopted at the semiannual meeting of the Christadelphian Ecclesia, of Jersey City, N. J., which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

CHRISTADELPHIAN ECCLESIA OF JERSEY CITY, N. J.,
Orange, N. J., July 11, 1917.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The writer has been requested by the Christadelphian Ecclesia of Jersey City, N. J., to forward to you a copy of the resolutions which were adopted at our semiannual meeting held at Jersey City, N. J., May 30, 1917, and I take pleasure in inclosing same to you herewith.

Yours, very truly, W. W. WELLS, Secretary.

"Resolved, That the Christadelphians at their semiannual meeting at Jersey City this day gave thanks unto our Father in Heaven, through His Son, Jesus Christ, for the divine guidance and blessings we enjoy in the land of our birth and sojourn. And that we also express thanks to the President and the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress for the wise provision made by them in the selective-military draft act approved on May 18, 1917, for the exemption of members of religious sects whose principles forbid such members to participate in war in any form, and which principles have always been among the religious convictions of the Christadelphians since their existence as an organized religious sect during the Civil War.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution adopted at the Fifty-first Annual Encampment of the Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, held at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., June 26 to June 28, 1917, which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

ALBANY, N. Y.

Resolved, That the Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, in this crisis of our country's history, heartily indorses the action of the President of the United States and Congress in placing the United States as one of the contestants in the present world war on the side of liberty and democracy and heartily pledges all the influences and efforts of the survivors of the Union veterans of the War of the Rebellion in sustaining our Government armies and navies in the present great contest.

Resolution approved unanimously at the Fifty-first Annual Encampment of the Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, held at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., June 26 to 28, 1917.

(Official.)

SOLOMON W. RUSSELL,
Department Commander.

Assistant Adjutant General.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has received a communication from the American Railway Employes' Journal, which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

KANSAS CITY, MO., July 9, 1917.

To the VICE PRESIDENT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I desire to lay before you the case of the American Railway Employe's Journal, to show the direct effect the Paper Trust has had in destroying a progressive business that was profitable and promising.

Under a contract I had previous to March, 1917, with printers, the Journal's profit on each subscriber was 11 cents per year, the subscription price being 50 cents a year. My contract ended in March. The printer asked an increase of 40 per cent, the entire increase being based on higher paper prices. The increase proposed amounted to an increase in the paper item of 65 per cent.

The situation that faced me was to either increase the subscription price or cut the size of the paper. Working men can not pay big subscription prices for papers. At that time the normal increase in the circulation was about 1,000 per month. I decided to cut the size of the paper. The paper was of 16 pages. There was no economy in cutting to 12 pages, as added presswork and folding and binding would eat up the difference. I cut the paper to eight pages.

At this time the Journal had the largest circulation of any independent labor paper in the United States. By independent I mean that it was not the official organ of any craft. Since its size has been cut the circulation has decreased 30 per cent, the new subscriptions not being in any measure equal to expirations which can not be renewed. This loss would continue until the circulation would reach a disgraceful level if the paper is continued. I will not be able to continue it, but will be forced to suspend, unless relief is obtained immediately. I view with absolute horror the necessity of quitting the publication, which is part of my life, and particularly in view of the fact that it will necessitate my owing thousands of men a portion of their subscriptions, some of which extend over two years. As you know, I can not refuse to take subscriptions as long as I am publishing the paper and continue printing it merely to fulfill my subscription requirements. I am forced to reduce my advertising rates. They were set at a figure just above production cost of the paper. The size of the paper and the fact that decency impelled a confession of decreasing rather than increasing circulation virtually has eliminated advertising with the Journal. In the meantime the overhead expense, aside from printing, is as high on an 8-page as on a 16-page paper.

A suspension of this valuable property will be necessary within two months unless relief is obtained from the present print-paper conditions. Let me implore you to act at once. Not only are private interests threatened in this unholy combination of business vultures, but public morals are in danger if these rich and influential scoundrels escape scot free after wrecking so many fine business enterprises. The country already has had too many examples of wealthy men who have risen above the law that binds us of lower social levels.

The Federal Trade Commission has been handling this matter for something over a year; has found the existence of a criminal conspiracy on the part of the paper manufacturers; yet, for some reasons beyond my comprehension, has never issued the necessary order to prevent the continuance of these monstrous wrongs.

In the circumstances, it does seem to me that the power is in the United States Congress to relieve the situation if it has to go to the extent of impeaching these derelict officials. Will you please have this made a part of the Senate record?

Yours, very truly,

THE AMERICAN RAILWAY EMPLOYE'S JOURNAL.
WILLIAM P. HARVEY.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the International Longshoremen's Association, in convention assembled at Toledo, Ohio, praying for the immediate passage of the food-administration bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have a letter from Mrs. E. E. Howell, superintendent of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Florence, S. C., in regard to the use of foods in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, and also a letter from Mr. Shorthill, who is secretary and treasurer of the National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Associations, in relation to the elimination from the pending food bill of all necessaries except foods and fuels. I ask that these two letters may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FLORENCE, S. C., July 14, 1917.

Senator NORRIS, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Can I withhold from our intrusted leaders that which should be known just at this time?

Seemingly all of America is living in suspense awaiting the decision in Congress of the great food bill. How can anyone say that prohibition is not a war measure and has nothing to do with the food bill? It is really one of the biggest things to be included in the conservation of foodstuffs. Is there any other waste in America as great as that in which foodstuff is used in the distillation of alcoholic drinks? How, then, can any food bill be complete without the elimination of grain in making strong drink?

The women are asked to use every effort possible in their homes and elsewhere to eliminate waste of foodstuff—this they are doing—and shall continue to make any sacrifice to win this war. The women of America are ready, with outstretched hands, to do anything that they are called upon to do. We are giving up our boys, our girls, our time, and our property for the love of our country; so it behooves you, our trusted leaders in Congress, to protect, support, and save them from that which will unfit them for service, contaminate their lives, and whirl their souls into eternity unprepared.

If men are sacrificing their lives for our protection, shall we be contented to see them go to the front underfed and absolutely unfitted by the use of alcoholic beverages to meet the enemy and win the war? Then, again, who shall be responsible for those who meet death in the war under the influence of strong drink? The great King, leader of all nations, shall be the judge; and if our sons, loved ones, or friends are among that number, what then? God grant that those men who have the decision of this great question in hand may think wisely. May they leave no leakage for remorse of conscience.

Yours, very truly, Mrs. E. E. HOWELL,
Woman's Christian Temperance Union,
Superintendent of Legislation and Petition.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF FARMERS' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS,
Hotel Bellevue, Washington, July 14, 1917.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
United States Senate, Washington.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I note with grave concern the situation which seems to be developing in the Senate in regard to the elimination from H. R. 4961 of all necessaries except foods and fuels. In this connection I earnestly solicit your careful consideration of the following suggestions:

Who is afraid to place the products of his labor or his genius in the hands of our President, when winning this war makes it necessary? Who is afraid to permit our Government to control the product of his labor or his genius in order that ruinous speculation in that product may be curbed? Certainly not the grain growers of this country!

The grain growers will never permit any other class to be more patriotic than they. They know that if this war is to be effectively fought it is just as necessary for our President to direct the distribution of our food as it is to manage the movements of our Army. They know that in times of war if some strong arm is not ever present, ready to act promptly and decisively, the heartless speculator will ruthlessly reap profits that are criminal. They know that in these things food is first always, and that it should be the first to be controlled.

But just as surely as food is first some other essential is second. Many other things almost take first place. In numerous cases it is difficult to determine which necessarily should be subjected to the most rigid control. So why should you at this time formulate or enact legislation which is designed to single out the control of food to the exclusion of all other necessaries? Why stop the advantages there?

The grain growers are ready for food control. They welcome it; but if the legislation that may be enacted is going to appeal to them as being just it must confer the power to exercise the very same control over any other necessary when unusual conditions demand it. They want no special favors permitted to or conferred upon any class by this legislation; they ask no special privileges for themselves; in fact, they are humiliated by the proposal to exempt them from any of the penalties of the law.

In this matter the grain growers of this country now "stand at the side" of our President. If the growers of other products, the miners, the manufacturers, the merchandisers of other necessaries will now step up in the same row this essential legislation can be passed in a day.

I am submitting this letter to you for the purpose only of giving you a correct presentation of the attitude of the grain growers toward the proposed legislation for food control, and in the hope that these suggestions may be received by you in the same helpful spirit in which they are tendered.

I beg permission to remain,

Very truly, yours, J. W. SHORTHILL,
Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. I am in receipt of a great many letters from people in my State with reference to the food bill, and especially with reference to the question of the manufacture of alcoholic liquors. I desire to present merely one of these letters, and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEVILS LAKE, N. DAK., June 24, 1917.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA:

I am sending in your care a petition to the Senate. I am sure it meets with your favor. I received a letter from Mr. Hoover asking me to urge upon the people from the pulpit the necessity of the most careful food conservation. His advice seemed to me sound, and I spoke to the people in the line suggested by Mr. Hoover. I greatly fear, however, that it will be hard to get the people to take very seriously any talk about the necessity of food conservation if the Senate insists on continuing the policy of wasting vast quantities of grain in rotting it to make booze. I have heard only words of commendation for the action of the House on this matter.

There is no use to try to fool the people. The Members of the Senate have better opportunity to know the real situation relative to the food supply than have the people. If they feel that the absolute waste of grain in this way is all right, it will be hard for the people to become interested in the matter of saving. It seems to me that the action and attitude of certain Members of the Senate is absolutely illogical and unpatriotic if there is any real danger of a food shortage. The booze business has had a grip on the throat of the people through their representatives all too long. There will come a day of terrible reckoning if the danger is such as Mr. Hoover indicates. Wishing you and your family every good blessing, I am,

Sincerely, C. E. STINSON.

DEVILS LAKE, N. DAK., June 24, 1917.

To the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned citizens of the United States, hereby petition you that you will at this time, in the interests of food conservation and the physical and moral strength of our Army and people, take such action as is necessary to wipe the traffic in alcoholic liquors from our land; that when you have accomplished this worthy deed that you place an embargo on the shipments of all foodstuffs to those of our allies who are rotting it to make booze.

C. E. STINSON
(And others).

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, two telegrams from wholesale dealers and business men of my State requesting the early passage of the food-control bill.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., July 14, 1917.

Senator GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Have telegraphed National Council of Defense to-day as follows: "Owing to heavy volunteer enlistments in agricultural districts and extraordinary activity on shipbuilding, agricultural districts of State face a present labor shortage and expect an acute shortage as harvest season advances. Can it be arranged for Army officer commanding this district to detail National Guard troops to these affected parts as for period not to exceed 30 days? If so, commander should consult with W. J. Kerr, president Oregon Agricultural College, chairman Oregon State council defense committee on agricultural labor and production."

Condition is really serious here, according to Kerr. I am notified this precedent already established at Medford through your cooperation. Can you cooperate in putting through above request?

HENRY L. COBETT,
Chairman Oregon State Council of Defense.

PORTLAND, OREG., July 14, 1917.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We urge prompt passage Lever food-administration bill. This measure necessarily grants Government unusual powers by reason of war conditions and grave crisis confronting America and her allies. As we understand it, this act is only for period of war. Authoritative facts gathered from official sources of the United States and other allied countries show urgent need of this legislation, and all trade interests should, and doubtless will, make necessary sacrifices to win the war. The delay now occurring upon food problem we believe is most dangerous to country's vital interests.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am in receipt of a copy of resolutions adopted by the National Association of Fisheries Commissioners, in annual convention at Providence, R. I., June 6-8, 1917, which has been sent to me by the conservation commissioner of the State of New York. I ask that the letter of Commissioner Pratt and the accompanying resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, CONSERVATION COMMISSION,
Albany, July 2, 1917.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith a resolution, passed by the National Association of Fisheries Commissioners at their convention in Providence the early part of June, in which the conservation commission most heartily concurs, with the request that you do whatever possible to obtain the regulations contemplated by the resolution.

The importance of this regulation has been emphasized in New York State during the last year when the commission made a detailed study of the streams of Oneida County for the purpose of laying down working plans for increasing fish production in those waters. During the course of this study pollution was found upon every hand, and Dr. Wilbert A. Clemens, who made this study for the commission, was obliged to recommend that no stocking be done in certain places until it is cleared up. In his detailed recommendations he stated as follows:

"The fish in the waters of the State constitute an extremely valuable resource, and adding anything to the water that will lower or destroy its productive capacity is contrary to the principles of conservation. Pollution does this. Excessive pollution leads ultimately to the extermination of fish life in the water. Less severe pollution makes conditions of living difficult for fish by destroying some of their natural food, by altering the oxygen and carbon dioxide content of the water, and by introducing factors which increase the possibilities of disease, all of which contribute to a reduction in the number of fish."

Much of the raw waste now discharged into streams can be so handled as to produce a product of commercial value. Regardless of this, however, it is clearly apparent, in the face of the need for increased food supply, that we are neglecting one of the most important methods of production when we permit, practically unchecked, pollution of waters that are potential fish producers.

Trusting that you will see the importance of vigorous action in this matter, I am,

Very truly, yours,

GEO. D. PRATT,
Commissioner.

Resolution adopted by National Association of Fisheries Commissioners in annual convention at Providence, R. I., June 6-8, 1917.

Whereas the great need for an increased supply of food is now apparent; and

Whereas the potential possibilities of both stream and tidal waters are of inestimable importance thereto; and

Whereas the use of streams and tidal waters for purposes of commerce are for the use of all the people, and that none are entitled to the abuse thereof to the serious detriment of any; and

Whereas the custom of discharging commercial and other waste into streams and tidal waters does seriously affect the production and maturing of marine food life, which could be greatly minimized if regulation thereof were made uniform and mandatory: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Association of Fisheries Commissioners, in regular convention assembled, in the interest of the great water-food industries and of the people of the United States, whom they serve, does present to the Congress of the United States the advisability and urgent need to enact such uniform regulations as may meet the needs above set forth.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present three resolutions adopted by the Texas State Council of Defense, which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Texas State Council of Defense, July 7, 1917.

Whereas in the food-control bill now before Congress it is being attempted to fix the price of cotton; and

Whereas your committee is of the opinion that to regulate or attempt at this time to fix the price of cotton would be most unfair and disastrous to the South for the reason that this is the most costly crop ever produced, and for the further reason that all farming implements and necessities were purchased prior to any attempt to fix prices on these articles by our Congress; and

Whereas such price fixing will at this time place the cotton growers at the mercy of the domestic and foreign cotton goods manufacturers, causing the farmer to face the nightmare and bankruptcy which overtook him in 1914; and

Whereas the exigencies of this war do not call for any legislation touching price fixing as to cotton, and not being an administrative measure: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the secretary of this council be requested to wire our Senators and Representatives to oppose any legislation fixing cotton prices at this time.

Resolution adopted by the Texas State Council of Defense July 7, 1917.

Whereas over large areas of the Southwest a severe drought has prevailed for the past year, causing depletion in the number of live stock; and

Whereas a continuation of such drought for another two months would be calamitous: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Texas State Council of Defense, That the attention of the national authorities be invited to a speedy and serious consideration of conditions, to the end of facilitating the movement of breeding cattle to other States and encouraging those who have grass and water to invest in such cattle according to their ability to care for them; and be it further

Resolved, That any proposed system controlling time of marketing or management of herds by statute or exercise of price fixing on live stock by the Government would, in our opinion, bring no relief, but, on the contrary, would have a tendency to decrease production.

Resolution adopted by the Texas State Council of Defense July 7, 1917.

Whereas the labor conditions in connection with the rail transportation of the State of Texas are the means of seriously handicapping the railroads in the matter of repairs to their tracks, bridges, and utensils; and

Whereas large numbers of colored laborers have been transported from the State of Texas to other States of the Union; and

Whereas the restrictions surrounding the Burnett immigration law have curtailed, if not absolutely eliminated, Mexican immigration for railroad purposes into the State of Texas: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the State council of defense urge upon the governor of this State and other governmental officers and upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress the necessity for suspension of the Burnett immigration law for six months, or such time as those authorities may deem prudent, to the extent that Mexican labor may be admitted into the State of Texas for work on railroad tracks, bridges, and utensils.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of the Woman's Missionary Societies of the Methodist Episcopal Church South of Rotan, Minneola, Valley View, and Roscoe, of the Methodist Auxiliary of Stanton, all in the State of Texas, and of the Emery Methodist Episcopal Sunday School South, of Brightwood, D. C., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have a letter from one of my constituents in the nature of a petition. It is very similar to a great many letters that I have received, and I desire merely to read a sentence or two from it. My correspondent says:

I have a little matter that I would relieve my mind of, and I know I voice the sentiments of a great big majority—nearly all—in what I say in these few lines. There is too much talk and not enough action in the matter of protecting the public against speculation in the necessities. No doubt, now, while the talk has been going on the speculators have secured control of about all of the actual living necessities of life. While the talk is going on they are busy about their business.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that this letter expresses the sentiments of a great many people of the country, and I think it is well, in connection with it, to call attention to the fact that while it may be true that there is too much talk in the Senate, the Senate has acted along lines which, in my judgment, would very largely control the prices of these necessities and prevent speculation in them; that the Senate has already passed amendments to a food bill prohibiting the storage and hoarding of foodstuffs for the purpose of getting exorbitant prices for them, and has also passed an amendment with that bill giving to the President the power to close gambling exchanges; that this was done over a month ago; that these amendments are in conference; and that we do not appear to be able to get any action thereon. So, while it may be true that there is a little too much talk, the talk is not delaying action along the lines which would bring substantial relief to the people, and that if there is any cause for delay in this matter it does not rest at the door of the Senate. These amendments should have been made law a month ago. They would have been if the House conferees had accepted them. Their enforcement as law would largely meet the needs and real expectations of our people. If hoarding and storing of food for exorbitant prices be stopped, if gambling in foodstuffs be prevented, the producer would secure reasonable prices for his products and the consumer would satisfy his needs at reasonable cost. Neither the Senate nor its talk has prevented these things. The blame rests elsewhere.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hot Springs, Mont., praying for national prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of the Woman's Missionary Council of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Charleston, Miss., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Alameda County Council of Defense of California, favoring the taking over by the Government of idle land in California and farming it as a war emergency measure, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SOLDIERS' TRAINING CAMPS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, my attention has been called to an article in the Washington Post which seems to be authentic. It refers to the fact that 125,000 State militia were ordered mobilized yesterday, all of them coming from the North, and all of them sent to southern camps.

I understand, of course, that the statement has been made that the southern camps are better on account of opportunities for winter training, but these troops, the article states, are to be sent to France by the 1st of October, so that the training, whatever it is, must, of course, be between this and some time in September.

I notice from this article that the New York troops are to be sent to Spartanburg, S. C.; the Pennsylvania troops to Augusta, Ga.; the Ohio and West Virginia troops to Montgomery, Ala.; the Michigan and Wisconsin troops to Waco, Tex.; and the Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota troops to Deming, N. Mex.

There probably is something about this which I do not understand, but no explanation has been made thus far which would warrant this unusual proceeding, including the tremendous expense of sending troops from the North into southern training camps for a few weeks, only to be brought back in a short time and sent to Europe. It seems that the Mexican experience is to be repeated, and at the risk of impairing the health and lives of our volunteers the sun-struck South is to have their training—the health of our soldiers and economy to the Treasury would seem to dictate another policy. If northern troops alone are to be sent to Europe, they should at least be prepared under the most favorable circumstances.

I hope that there will be an explanation which will be satisfactory to the people, not only why this extra expense is caused, but why this trouble is incurred to the militia of the North, who have been notified that they will be the first to go to France; why they should not be trained in camps in their own States, and under the most favorable conditions. The climate of northern Europe is similar to that of the Northern States.

I repeat, this article seems to be official, but it is exceedingly incomprehensible to me, as I believe it is to a great many others who have been reading of this matter and looking into the conditions which surround it.

MRS. NANCY E. MULLINS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 646) for the relief of Mrs. Nancy E. Mullins, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 84) thereon.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 4285), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 4285), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RECENT DISTURBANCES IN EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, concurrent resolution No. 10 went over on Saturday last under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We have not yet reached that order of business.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senate will bear with me for about 10 minutes, I should like to make some comments on the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this resolution was introduced in view of the conditions which I have just reason to believe prevail in the city of East St. Louis, Ill. I have a number of letters addressed to me personally, which I have forborne to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD because of conditions still existing in that city. I do not believe it would be wise to make public the names of the gentlemen who have addressed these letters to me. They are in business in East St. Louis, and all of them with whom I am acquainted—a considerable number—are reputable men and the heads of reputable business concerns. They prefer that their names be not made public at this time. Out of consideration for their request, I shall not now and until further developments give any of their names, save to make the general statement as to their standing, which I have done.

The substance of these letters, Mr. President, is that the conditions in East St. Louis are yet dangerous. They ask that some proper power, outside of the local authorities, may be invoked to prevent the recurrence of the outbreak which prompted this resolution. To the causes of the conditions I shall not allude. They are ones that can properly be investigated either by the Department of Justice or by a joint committee of Congress. I myself am not partial as to the method that may be employed to obtain the proper results. Whether it be by a congressional committee or whether it be by the Department of Justice, through the convening of the United States district court and the designation of a judge in that jurisdiction to make the investigation through the agency of a grand jury, I do not care; I am not committed to the one method or the other; but I do ask that this resolution be considered by the Senate on some proper occasion, and as promptly as possible, to the end that if the House, if it so happen, do not concur in the resolution, such notice may be brought to the attention of the Department of Justice as will cause a session of the United States court to be convened, a United States grand jury empaneled, and an investigation undertaken.

I do not think any local authority in St. Clair County, in which East St. Louis is located, or a grand jury of that county will be at all adequate to clear the situation. I do not believe that any local prosecuting officer would produce the needed results. I do not believe, if an indictment should be had of any of the guilty parties, that trial by a local jury would be likely in such an affair to insure justice.

I am familiar with the conditions that existed in the State of Illinois in connection with at least four riots which have occurred, based either upon race conditions or upon substantially similar conditions as those which prevailed in East St. Louis. I have seen very recently efforts made to prosecute and punish offenders in similar cases. It is with considerable humiliation that I call attention to the prosecutions resulting from the activity of the local authorities on a former occasion in my home city of Springfield, Ill. A riot occurred there in August, 1908, in which deaths resulted. A grand jury indicted and the trials were had before the circuit court, a court of general jurisdiction, with a fair and impartial judge, Judge James C. Creighton, now dead, presiding. He administered the law impartially. A jury was impaneled, drawn from the body of the county of Sangamon. The trials resulted in acquittal, although in some cases convictions ought to have been had, and I believe convictions would have been had if it had not been for the local prejudice or feeling that attended the trial of those causes. It is too much to expect a jury in such intense local situations to convict.

I believe that in this instance an investigation ought to be had, not by the local authority of the county, not even by State authority, as a finality, but I believe it ought to be had by a joint committee of Congress, or by a United States grand jury impaneled by a district judge of the United States court. If that is done the power will be sufficiently impartial, comprehensive, and strong to investigate and to find what the underlying conditions are. Unless the investigation shall be had by United States authority, in my judgment, it will be inconclusive and incomplete.

I believe that the investigation ought to be had promptly. The letters which I have received from reputable men, residents of East St. Louis, lead me to believe that if the National Guard now in the city of East St. Louis should be withdrawn a recurrence of the lamentable riot which recently occurred is likely. These men ask that some Federal authority take charge of this investigation; that it be thorough and comprehensive; and that a manifestation of governmental power be shown that will to some degree, at least, strike terror to the hearts of the evildoers still resident of that city. If such an investigation be not had, I am laboring under the belief that a recurrence of the riot will possibly come about within a very short time.

The authority that is now there of a military character, the National Guard of the State, can not be kept there indefinitely. If it should be withdrawn, the underlying conditions in that city, the racial, economic, and municipal conditions prevalent there, are such as to promote another riot with consequent deaths and the destruction of property, even more serious than the riot which is in the public mind.

With this in view I introduced Senate concurrent resolution No. 10, which is lying on the table for senatorial action, and I desired to present opportunely and within proper limits my reasons for the introduction of the resolution. I am asking this not for local protection, but I am asking it because this country is likely to be further humiliated. Colored citizens of the United States and white citizens of the United States resident in East St. Louis are now dwelling upon the edge of another civil commotion. They are to-day living in the crater of a volcano that may erupt, with consequent riots that will be more shameful than even the riots of a few days ago unless some strong arm, exerted by governmental authority, shall reach in from the outside, insure a thorough investigation, indict any persons who merit prosecution, and act under such a warrant of authority that the jury upon the trial of an indictment found may be not a jury of the county, but may be drawn from the whole of the judicial district. That kind of a jury would probably administer justice, and if the defendant were guilty he would be convicted, and if not he would be acquitted; but I feel that a local jury drawn under the jurisdiction of a State court, a circuit court, which is the court there of general jurisdiction, a jury drawn from St. Clair County, subject to the prejudices and the influences on the one side or the other, would not by their nearness to the local situation be so likely to administer justice. That has been the invariable result in the riots that have occurred in that State. Local authorities, local juries drawn, as they must be, from the county in which the violence occurred, do not so well administer justice, but unconsciously become subject to the same debased influence that secured acquittals in cases where there ought to have been convictions.

I say this deliberately and with the greatest regret. I say it in justice to other parts of our country. It has been sometimes said that local influences secure the acquittal of men who have been guilty of riots and the loss of life of citizens caused by those riots in other parts of the United States, especially in what we call the Southern States. I make no distinction. There is as much local influence securing the acquittal of men who are guilty in the State of Illinois as there has ever been in the States of Georgia and Mississippi.

For that reason I believe this trial ought to be had, or the investigation, and any trials consequent upon the indictments found ought to be under the direction of the Government authorities. I hesitate to make this advance. I hesitate myself to go to the Department of Justice, the Attorney General of the United States, and make this request. I should prefer that it be done by others, or be done upon his own motion, upon the request of citizens from the locality concerned. But, at any rate, the prosecution and the indictment of these offenders ought to follow. It ought to follow from the action of the Attorney General, or the evidence ought to be unearthed and placed before the proper department by a congressional committee in order that there may be a full and complete history of this case.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Under what theory would the Senator make this a Federal offense? Murder and arson were committed within the limits of the State. That is an offense against the State authority. What would be the indictment that the Senator would urge against these people that would make the offense cognizable by a Federal grand jury?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think an investigation would show, Mr. President, that certain aliens were killed and some injured—not colored men, but aliens. I think one was shot by the Illinois National Guard while guarding one of the packing plants. I do not wish to make any invidious comparisons, but it is a name just like those that were read here by the Secretary upon a certain occasion. It belongs to the same nationality. I think some of them found there are aliens. I think some are the same kind of people to whom objection is made in the lead and zinc belt in Missouri and in Arizona. Some 800 or 1,000 people in each State have recently been deprived of the right to work. I think an investigation would show that some of these men—not citizens of the United States, necessarily, but resident aliens—on the pay rolls of some of the industrial concerns in that city were affected by the disturbances that occurred.

If the aliens had transgressed a local law, they no doubt would be subject to indictment and punishment in the local courts only, the State courts; but there are certain treaty rights of aliens that could give, under a proper showing, jurisdiction to the United States district court, especially if any of the living aliens who engaged in this riot should invoke the treaty rights that exist. They might remove their cause into a United States court. I am not sure but that upon an investigation, while amenable to the local laws of the State, some aliens might, on a report of a grand jury, be deemed undesirable citizens, and ordered by a court to be deported on a final hearing.

I think, on an investigation, that a ground for Federal jurisdiction can be found. I do not want to go into the matter at length, but I believe a sufficient number of people found there who are not citizens of the United States could be brought within the jurisdiction of the court and a United States grand jury impaneled by that court.

I say, with a feeling of gravity of the conditions gathered from the correspondence, that something must be done. Some proper investigation can be had. No one would question the right of a congressional committee to investigate, and investigate thoroughly. East St. Louis stands at the gateway of a vast interstate commerce. Outside of some local advantages East St. Louis is the overflow from the city of St. Louis, Mo., and I wish to add to this statement that all of the interstate commerce converges at the three bridges that cross the Mississippi River into St. Louis from the Illinois side. The interstate commerce that can be interfered with by a recurrence of the riot in East St. Louis is continental in character and very great in its volume.

A large number of through lines center in East St. Louis and go on to the Pacific coast. They connect with all of the Atlantic seaboard towns through the Pennsylvania road and other lines of a like character. A riot in East St. Louis means that not only will the United States mails be held up but, further, that all of the freight transportation, all of the necessary merchandise connected with the preparation for war, will be held up at this same point. Practically nothing can get into St. Louis from the East or can get out of it on the eastbound freights unless it goes over one of the three bridges across the Mississippi River, and none of them can be crossed if there is a civil commotion in East St. Louis or the adjoining suburbs. East St. Louis has nominally 65,000 people, but more than 35,000 are in the adjoining manufacturing towns of Granite City, Venice, Madison, and one or two others. Therefore civil commotion means—and I think it is enough to justify action by Congress if no menace existed to the local conditions of property in East St. Louis—civil commotion in East St. Louis, I wish to impress specifically upon the Senate, means that all of the eastbound freight coming from St. Louis and all of the westbound freight going into St. Louis will be held up at the point where it strikes the disturbed area. The approaches to the bridges can not be used; all of the immense foodstuff supplies that come from the West and Southwest, coming by way of St. Louis, will be inevitably endangered by a recurrence of public disorder at this particular point.

I think this would justify Congress, both Houses, in an immediate investigation. I am sure that if a congressional committee goes in there, it will act as a protection; it will get the truth that no local investigation will ever get.

The attorney general, Mr. Brundage, is on the ground now in person or through his assistant before the St. Clair County grand jury, and I am sure that they would welcome help from the outside. I think I can properly say that it would not be regarded by the local authorities as an interference, but would be regarded as a very desirable help in a task that has gone beyond their ability to do what is needed to preserve the rights of persons and property.

I should like, if it were possible, to make public the names of these men. I can only say to the Senators that they are among the reliable, responsible business men of East St. Louis. I believe giving their names now would only mark them, possibly, for future victims of mob violence, and out of a desire to protect them against possible injury of that kind I refrain.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I hope the resolution the Senator from Illinois has introduced will pass, and I hope the committee will be appointed. I want to say a few words before that is done. I am glad the Senator from Illinois introduced this resolution and has taken such an active part in ferreting out the truth about the East St. Louis riot, because it concerns his own State vitally and the whole country indirectly and is most important.

From what I know about the I. W. W.'s, they are a bad lot, whether citizens or aliens, and should not be tolerated in this country if it is possible to get rid of them legally. Many good, hard-working Americans have joined this association because it preaches a doctrine which appeals to them; the wrongs of labor, real or imaginary—there are both. I have undoubted evidence from my viewpoint that the riot arose because negroes from the South had been brought to East St. Louis for the purpose of taking the places of white laborers, whether I. W. W.'s or what kind of laborers I do not know, but they were white men. I have known for many years and not hesitated to say so all over the North in my lectures and on the floor of this Senate that the average Yankee—we Southerners call all men Yankees north of the Mason and Dixon line—has no love for the negro except for political reasons. They want his vote and nothing else. I do not propose to go into the cause of the war or the whys and wherefores of this feeling; enough that it exists. The North is now beginning to understand the South and to understand the race problem, too, and I am very glad to see so many northern men being ordered to camps in the South for drilling and training. In this way they will see something of the race problem in its home, where there are the most negroes, and learn much more than they would have ever known had they not sojourned a few months in the "home of the negro." The Spanish War served to open the eyes of a great many of the troops from the North about the race problem, and this war will add to that information and increase the knowledge of the true conditions down there and the cause which produces it. The more the northern people know of the negro the less they like him. I have epitomized it by saying "They love him according to the square of the distance." The farther off he is the better they like him.

I have here a clipping from the Augusta Chronicle of July 12, a very fair and impartial paper, most ably edited, giving some facts about the East St. Louis riot and its cause, that I want put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, after it has been read, for the information of the Senate, so that the facts as given by a distinguished southern minister now residing in St. Louis may be presented to the country in an authoritative shape. It is no use to mince words any longer. My own attitude on this subject was explained last year when I, in this Chamber, stated:

I have come to think, since the unveiling of the Confederate Monument at Arlington, that the North itself has at last realized that Gen. Lee's home, in a sacred and inalienable sense, belongs to the South, and I am willing to help make of it a place where both sections can go for inspiration.

Half a century since Appomattox! There is a man in this Chamber still who wore the Confederate gray, and two and perhaps three who wore the Union blue! Half a century since the Constitution was amended by the rifle and the bayonet; since might made right; since gunpowder prevailed over logic! I never believed it possible that I could do it, but slowly and by degrees I have come to think that it was best for all concerned that the South was defeated; and for me to say that is a marvel to myself. Slavery was a curse which had to be destroyed ere the South and the world could advance. It was a curse for which the South was no more responsible than the North. Both sections were responsible, and both paid four long, bloody years of penance for their joint sin. It had to go, and while it went in the worst possible way and its going gave birth to an apparently unsolvable problem, still I, who was born in and of the Old South, am glad it is gone never to return. I am glad, also, that the idea of nationality has supplanted that of confederation, despite the dangers involved. And so I can find it in my heart to want to make the amphitheater at Arlington truly national in its scope.

Slavery was a curse and the Civil War was necessary to destroy it. Nothing else could have done it, because of the profit there was in it, just as the greed of man is now producing this tragedy in East St. Louis. The same struggle for freedom and the rights of the laboring classes is going on in Europe right now.

Some time I hope to discuss the South's treatment of the negro and show where our people are treating him wrongly and unjustly, but my health is so poor I may never be able to write out just what I want to say. It ought to be stated by some old slaveholder like myself.

More and more it becomes evident that the native Americans and the descendants of the early immigrants grow less and less friendly toward foreign-born competitors, no matter where they come from, and when they happen to be black, as the negroes from the South are, this feeling is added to by race prejudice and caste feeling. The white blood becoming once aroused grows savage and very, very cruel.

In my observation and experience nothing that I have ever read about or come in contact with equals the savagery and anger caused by race prejudice and caste feeling. They are as cruel and remorseless as religious bigotry and fanaticism under Philip the Second of Spain and the Duke of Alva.

I ask that the Secretary may read the clipping I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Augusta Chronicle, July 12, 1917.]

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE EAST ST. LOUIS MASSACRE.

There is an impression among the negroes of this community, and perhaps other southern communities, so the Chronicle is told, that the stories published in southern newspapers concerning the recent East St. Louis race riots were either altogether untrue or greatly exaggerated, and that this was done to deter negroes from leaving the South for the North and West.

From this it is evident that there are demagogues among the Negro race as well as among the white race, and that these false leaders have, either ignorantly or otherwise, been imposing upon the credulity of their people. This in itself presents a sad phase of the situation, and one that some effort should be made to correct; not so much on behalf of the South as upon behalf of the negroes themselves.

Fortunately for the negroes of this particular section, however, they have such safe and sane leaders as Dr. Charlie Walker, Silas Floyd, L. E. White, L. P. Pinckney, J. W. Whitehead, J. M. Nabrit, Louis E. Moseley, Dr. J. N. Storey, and others, from whom the truth may be learned about this or any other matter affecting their race—indeed, whose leadership is a blessing for both races in the South.

From such leaders as these the negroes will learn that the published stories of the East St. Louis riots were only too true; indeed, that all the horrible details were not even printed. But if they would have further proof of this, the Chronicle is in position to quote from a sermon delivered in St. Louis last Sunday morning by Rev. Dr. J. W. Lee, one of the ablest Methodist ministers in the country. Dr. Lee is a native of Georgia and was up to a few years ago located in Atlanta. He knows the South and he knows the negro, and he was therefore greatly shocked and outraged, as all true men of the South were, by the East St. Louis massacre.

Being on or near the spot, Dr. Lee speaks with first-hand knowledge of what occurred and of the causes leading up to this wholesale murder of those southern negroes in East St. Louis. Among other things, Dr. Lee said:

"The record given in one of the city papers, which tells of the deliberate, murderous brutality displayed against the poor negroes in the State of Abraham Lincoln, is as bad as anything ever perpetrated in Armenia by the Turks or in Belgium by the Germans.

"Think of negroes who had been guilty of no offense pleading for their lives with raised hands, surrounded by groups of white men and stoned to death. Think of a negro, covered with blood and half conscious, raising himself on his elbow to see if there was any chance of escape, being met by a young man, better dressed than most of the others, lifting a flat stone in both hands and hurling it upon the poor negro's neck. Think of negro women, begging for mercy and pleading they had harmed no one, set upon by white women of the underworld and answering the coarse sallies of men as they beat the negresses' faces and breasts with fists, stones, and sticks. Think of hot-headed youths, mixed now and then with men of middle age, enjoying, as it were, a kind of sport in the task of destroying the life of every discoverable black man."

"Think of all this, and remember that there were but few militiamen to be seen anywhere, and with no serious effort on the part of those who were seen to prevent bloodshed. Think of men in uniform frankly fraternizing with the murderers engaged in killing the negroes. Think of all this and more, given in a most careful report by one of the best reporters in our city, and then see if you can recall anything worse that ever happened in Belgium or Poland or Armenia or anywhere else on the face of the earth.

"Never again can one section of the country select and set apart any other section as barbarians to a greater extent than other places. We have been having lynchings in the South and lynchings in the North, but no other part of our country can say to any other part, 'Physician, heal thyself.' All parts are guilty under the stress of mob hate of giving way to the vilest passions of which human nature is capable.

"The best people in East St. Louis are not to blame, as the best people in the South were never to blame for the lynchings in that section. The whole situation, North and South, is due to the fact that politicians without conscience have been permitted to occupy places of authority, and they have deliberately excused dives and places of immoral resort, if they have not even fostered them, and through the influence of such places there have grown up among us a class of people that are a menace to orderly government and to American civilization itself.

"In view of all this, it must be clear that what we need in the United States to-day is a new civilization in which there must be the silent reassertion of the principle of an authority purged and purified by the rejection of all unworthy elements, an authority based on the reality of eternal laws. We must bring back into human life that recognition of the value and sacredness of life that we have more or less lost in the past 50 years.

"We must establish a class made up of the best people, who shall assume the responsibility of elections to office, and keeping in office, only such persons as will themselves observe the law and force others to observe it."

All of the above is true and it is timely. It is well that such words were spoken by a man of Dr. Lee's fine type; a man who is not only a Christian gentleman and minister of the gospel but a southerner who has the manhood to demand fair treatment for the negro—even in the State of Lincoln.

A few days ago the Chronicle had occasion to publish a statement from Rev. Dr. C. T. Walker, perhaps the ablest negro minister in the South, who, while making the complaint that the negro had not always been fairly treated in the South, warned the members of his race that their best opportunities are not in the North but right here in the South, where they are known and, generally speaking, are valued for what they are.

This, too, is true, and can not be too strongly emphasized. It is regrettably true that the negro has not always received fair treatment in the South, but, on the whole, he is given greater consideration in a practical way and is offered better opportunities, within his sphere of activities, than he is offered, generally speaking, in the North.

The Chronicle can but fear that the East St. Louis outrage is but a forerunner of similar atrocities in the North and West, for as the negro becomes more and more numerous in that section, and therefore comes more and more into competition with white labor, he is almost certain to encounter violence. At least this may be so, unless, as Dr. Lee suggests, the better class of people take matters into their own hands and prevent it.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my colleague yield just a moment? I ask the Senate to consent to a vote on this resolution. I earnestly hope there will be no objection to taking a vote on the resolution.

Mr. LEWIS. At the present time I wish to address myself to the resolution.

Mr. President, what I shall say to the Senate will consume but a moment of time. My colleague, Senator SHERMAN, has very commendably entered into the consideration of this matter which has been termed throughout the Nation the "East St. Louis riot." That there should be some investigation I take it any citizen of this country would gladly indorse.

At the threshhold we are met with an ever constant difficulty, which has confronted the Congress every time it has assumed to enter upon a similar field, and that is whether the Federal Government will enter upon the jurisdiction of a matter which States have already assumed the jurisdiction of, or whether it will wait until the State has concluded its efforts and then either cooperate or refuse to complicate the results by its interference.

Mr. President, I do not know when the time will come when race prejudice will be wiped out in America. I regret to confess that race prejudice seems to multiply with the multiplication of civilization. I am unable to understand the causes.

I had occasion lately to read a treatise which the eminent senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] put in the hands, if I am not in error, of the distinguished junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. In this book there was a general dissertation upon the question up and down, of the variation and gradation of the treatment by civilization of the ethnological question and the prejudices of the whites against the blacks in South Africa, Australia, Canada and British Columbia, Egypt, Madagascar, France and Algiers, the Southern States in the United States of America, and by Northern States in the United States of America. I was particularly interested to observe that the philosophy upon that field finally came to the conclusion that the whole solution would rest ultimately upon the development of the individual of the particular race, the development of standards of the person of the race rather than any attempt on the part of legislative bodies to supervise a whole race and prescribe some standards for the government of the race, or for the supervision of one people by another. It is all left to the individual as a unit of civilization; to that constituent is left the solution, all determining on the personal education and personal evolution of each citizen.

Mr. President, I know nothing, sir, of the details of those unfortunate happenings at East St. Louis. My information is that which we all have gathered from the public press. I understood from my eminent colleague, from an address he made here some days ago, that the confusion really arose from the influence of the saloon, and I would rather believe that to be true than to feel that it sprang from any spirit of lawlessness or disregard of the rights of any man by any of its people.

Mr. President, I can not believe that in East St. Louis, where the proportion of population measured by that termed the southerner is so small in comparison with those who are from other States, could have risen up merely to execute a prejudice against the Negro as such. I can not believe that would happen. I can not believe it would exist.

I am not blind at this time to the fact—I may say that I am not unconscious of the history—that in Ohio, in Illinois, in Minnesota, in Massachusetts, New York, and in every big Northern State conditions have from time to time arisen and practically justified some of the observations of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has likewise given some attention to a philological phase of this subject, and no doubt when I have concluded wishes to address the Senate again to the consideration of it. I will not enter upon that field. I merely rise to assure my colleagues that I have personally taken up this subject with the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice has already entered upon the field of inquiry. The Federal Department of Justice has already proceeded to take steps to make such investigation as will not conflict with the action of the governor of the State of Illinois and the attorney general of the State cooperating with the governor.

Mr. President, there is, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] intimated, a very delicate line as to where the Federal jurisdiction enters. I would rather say it would turn upon the Federal statute rather than upon the distinction that my colleague would draw.

My colleague intimates that there were some foreign-born citizens or subjects who were the victims of some of these assaults. I am rather of the opinion that the statute of the United States which assumes to protect every citizen in his equal rights and immunities under the law would vest Congress or the Department of Justice with a jurisdiction to inquire as to whether any citizen, white or black, has been deprived by any other citizen, or citizens, white or black, of those equal rights and immunities granted under the Federal law or through the Federal Constitution. Therefore I assume, sir, that that gives sufficient Federal jurisdiction for our Government to enter upon an inquiry. If it shall be discovered by the Department of Justice that the entrance upon this inquiry conflicts with what the State is doing, then, sir, the inquiry on the part of the Federal Government may be suspended, but I am pleased to inform my colleague that I know the Department of Justice has already set the machinery into operation to have the Government ascertain, so far as it can, where it may serve, and that it will thereafter serve to the full extent of its capacity. If I do no violence to its intention, gathered merely from inferences, the intention is to have the investigation conducted under a Federal judge—one of the Federal judges now in office in the State of Illinois, the investigation to be conducted under his supervision—and in that way the grand jury will come from the whole judicial district and not from any one limited county, and in order that it may not be purely local, it is deemed best by the Department of Justice that one presiding Federal judge would conduct it with more impartiality and fairness. Such is at present, if I am not wrong in my deduction of what has been stated, one of the contemplations of the Department of Justice.

Mr. President, having made this statement, I am not discussing the resolution; I am offering information to my colleague and to the Senate, and I beg to assure him that I have every confidence that when this investigation has been undertaken by the present Department of Justice it will be carried out in the full meaning of the Constitution for the protection of the American citizen or the citizen of this country, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I have no desire to address the Senate this afternoon upon the resolution. I shall not at any time oppose the resolution, for the reason that I think the more this subject or question is studied, considered impartially and philosophically, the sooner the great problem will be solved. And in the providence of God it must be solved. The interests of the white and black races demand it, and the civilization of the world makes it imperative.

If there shall be a committee appointed under this resolution to investigate this question, I sincerely hope that it may be composed of men who will undertake the important task fully conscious of the magnitude of the undertaking and go to the very bottom of the problem.

I regard the trouble in East St. Louis as an unfortunate manifestation of the most difficult problem that the white man has ever been called upon to solve.

It is of vastly more importance and far-reaching in its consequences than the unfortunate war in which this country is now involved.

If the resolution is not disposed of to-day or to-morrow, I should like to submit a few observations upon it. While I shall not undertake to discuss the question at this time, I will say that I am glad the American people, particularly the people of the North, are being driven irresistibly to the conclusion that the race problem in America is no longer a sectional or southern question. It may be in a more concrete or acute form in the Southern States, but, as a matter of fact, it is as national in all of its elements as any problem that ever emanated from the pregnant womb of time.

Unless the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is particularly desirous of having the matter disposed of to-day, I should like to have the resolution to go over a day or two, because I should like to have something to say, and I am not prepared to submit my observation at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator that the resolution must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It calls for an expenditure of money out of the contingent fund.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I thought the resolution was up for final consideration. I wish to say just at this point my good friend, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is mistaken when he says that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] gave me a book on the question, which he quoted from. He is mistaken in that. It was some other book from some one else. I have had one or two very interesting conversations with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on the question under discussion, but he did not give me the book the Senator from Illinois referred to.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I desire to ask out of order to publish a petition of the people of Mississippi on the prohibition question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE
(Care of Senator JAMES K. VARDAMAN),
Washington, D. C.:

Undersigned petition your honorable body not to tax but prohibit the liquor business as a war measure. Above petition was indorsed by vote at meeting held under auspices of Woman's Missionary Council, Methodist Episcopal Church South, in city of Cleveland, State of Mississippi, by (name church or society here) Cleveland Auxiliary.

Attest:

Mrs. S. C. TAYLOR, Presiding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

STRIKE OF MINERS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent to have read at the desk a telegram from Bisbee, Ariz.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

BISBEE, ARIZ., July 14, 1917.

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned, representing the Citizens' Protective League, and the Loyalty League, comprised of citizens and workmen of Bisbee, Ariz., make this statement to set forth the true facts and reasons for the deportation of 1,200 I. W. W. from Bisbee on July 12. The strike was called by few outside I. W. W. agitators. The most important demands made were for a minimum wage of $6 a day and the abolishment of physical examination required to get employment. Bisbee is the highest paid mining camp in the country, and in no camp are working conditions better or greater safeguards used for protection of workmen. Wages are based upon the price of copper, and the next pay check will be $5.75 per day for miners for an eight-hour day. The physical examination of applicants for jobs has been required largely to protect workmen from contaminating diseases. The strike has been marked by violence, acts of intimidation, and treasonable statements on the part of the I. W. W. Streets have been clogged with pickets who made threats of violence and disregarded the rights of pedestrians, including women and children. Homes of loyal workmen have been visited and families terrorized by threats. Even the mayor has been threatened and his official orders disregarded. Destruction of life and property has been threatened. The only thing that has prevented destruction of property and more injuries to persons has been the vigilance of Sheriff Wheeler. I. W. W. were coming into Bisbee on every train to swell ranks of those already here, their purpose was to stir up strife and dissention and to tie up the mines and paralyze local industries of all kinds. Seventy-five per cent of the I. W. W. pickets were strangers in the community; repeated requests were made by the mayor, city council, sheriff, and other officers that the rights of peaceable citizens and workmen be respected. When such requests were ignored and threats and acts of intimidation continued, it then became necessary for the citizens and loyal workmen of Bisbee to assist the sheriff in putting a stop to such treasonable actions. Therefore, on the morning of July 12, approximately 2,000 reputable citizens, and residents of Bisbee, under direction of Sheriff Wheeler, met at appointed places and proceeded to gather up and disarm the I. W. W. pickets and leaders. No violence was shown before loading them in cars for deportation. They were offered an opportunity to remain in camp provided they could obtain someone to vouch for them and upon condition that they ceased their treasonable utterances and acts against the Government and the community. Under these conditions many remained. Probably 90 per cent of those deported were strangers with no place of residence in the community. This is shown conclusively by the fact that nearly 400 I. W. W. were arrested in the Union Hall sleeping on the floors. Many deported were Austrians and alien enemies. The citizens acted as deputies and as a part of the sheriff's posse. Under his orders and direction sufficient food and water was placed in the cars to accommodate the needs of the men deported and the train sent to Columbus, N. Mex. The community is now quiet and peaceful, over half of the normal number of men are now actually working in the mines, and the community is no longer terrorized and intimidated. The deportation was prompted by no other spirit than one of patriotism and loyalty to the Government of the United States. Mines all over this State and country have been closed by these same I. W. W. agitators, and at a time when all loyal citizens should be assisting the Government rather than crippling it and paralyzing its industries. The citizens and loyal workers of Bisbee as patriotic men in an hour when the Government needs loyalty felt that the time had come when they could best show that patriotism and loyalty by assisting the sheriff to aid in ridding the community of men who were preaching a doctrine of violence and treason. Any loyal American who desires work is welcome to Bisbee, and will be given protection and an opportunity to work. The Citizens' League and the Loyalty League, however, stand firmly behind the sheriff not to tolerate the further presence of men whose only desire is to terrorize the community, resort to violence, and cripple industries in an hour when patriotic service should be given as asked for by President Wilson.

J. R. HENDERSON,
President Citizens' Protective League.
L. W. MERRILL,
President Workmen Loyalty League.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. ASHURST] has presented and has had read into the RECORD a telegram, a copy of which was also sent to me. I have attempted three separate times to get the floor in order to present a copy of that telegram to the Senate and to ask that it be read for the information of this body and in defense of the people themselves who have deported a certain number of people from the city of Bisbee. It is immaterial to me, so that the matter is in the RECORD, whether it be presented by my colleague or by myself. The present occupant of the chair was not presiding at the time when I attempted to obtain recognition to present the telegram.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have also received many other dispatches similar to the one which has been read, and doubtless my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] has also received such dispatches. I do not wish to incorporate those dispatches in the RECORD, but I ask to have read an excerpt from a letter which I have received from a former attorney general of Arizona with reference to this same subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The situation in Jerome and in many other mining camps in Arizona is that hundreds of loyal men, members in good standing of labor unions, are being prevented by these public enemies (90 per cent of whom are either aliens or of alien descent) from working the mines of Arizona, the product of which is so vital to our Government in this crisis.

I myself have heard expressions from many of the Independent Workers of the World which proved them to be treasonable. It should be understood that it would make no difference to these Independent Workers of the World if every one of their demands were granted immediately; they would come again with others more unreasonable and continue until further compliance would be impossible. In other words, the only purpose they have, regardless of their avowal, is to embarrass, and, if possible, destroy the American Union.

The most superficial investigation in Arizona at this time will convince any fair-minded man of the truth of this statement. It is not a labor problem or an issue betwen employer and employee in any sense; it is a deep-laid plot against the Government.

CENSUS FOR MILITARY DRAFT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read by the Secretary an editorial appearing in the Bridgeport Post in relation to the census of the population furnished for the purpose of the military draft.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNFAIR RATINGS.

It is not at all surprising that even the New York World kicks over the utterly misleading figures promulgated by the United States Census department for purposes of the draft. The World calls them "absurd" and "misleading," and so they are.

For what earthly good is Bridgeport rated at 278,906? It is an utterly preposterous figure. The city is nowhere near that total. In our judgment it may have reached 160,000, but no more. To give it over 100,000 more is so out of the way and so contrary to every known estimate that one can only account for it on the principle that ignorance or partisanship prompted it for some special purpose not yet unfolded.

Just so with Connecticut at large, the count is raised from the census figure of 1,114,000 to something over 1,750,000, or nearly half a million above the indicated figures from every recognized basis of estimate.

These sections are not the only victims of such fool figuring. New York gets a raise of nearly 2,000,000 and Chicago about the same increase. Detroit is put at nearly four times the census figure, jumping from 485,000 to 1,454,000.

Now note the difference in treatment of sections. All the great increases and ridiculous estimates are in the Northern and Central States. Kentucky—that is down South, you see—is rated as having 300,000 people less, while Tennessee is given 200,000 less, and so it goes. Hardly any change is made in States like Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina.

One would like to know the prompting motive behind such estimates, and it might be well for our Senators and Congressmen to demand a show of papers on such inexcusable ratings and such extraordinary favoritism as is displayed by the figures quoted, which are taken from the New York World, a strong supporter of the administration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have had quite a number of inquiries and complaints in relation to this matter. I am sure that every State in the Union desires to furnish, if necessary, its full quota of troops for this great war in proportion to its population. I desire, however, to call the attention of the Senate not only to the injury done to States and to cities by overestimating their population, but it so happens, as shown by a table which was put in the RECORD the other morning by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], that inasmuch as all the aliens in this country are exempt from the draft, and inasmuch as the proportion of aliens in many of the Southern States varies from one-half of 1 per cent to 1 or perhaps 2 per cent, while the proportion of aliens in some of the Northern States varies from 10 to 20 per cent, the result of exempting all of the aliens from the draft is not only to excuse them from service but to place pro rata, according to the total population of a State, upon American citizens the burden of the work of defending the lives and property of the aliens who are enjoying the benefits of the institutions of this country.

I do not know whether anything can be done at this late day, in view of the early draft proceedings which are contemplated, to correct that great inequity and great injustice to the citizens of this country. I have had letters from my State giving astounding illustrations of the great injustice done in this respect. I believe the city of New Britain, which is a great manufacturing city, is a startling example of what will result under the conscription law. Somebody wrote me the other day that they had taken a poll of several of the large factories in that city, which developed that there were 3,500 aliens and 3,500 citizens engaged in those two or three factories. The result is the 3,500 aliens are going to remain there, while a large proportion of the 3,500 American citizens are going to be drafted and sent abroad to defend the 3,500 aliens who are entirely exempt.

Mr. LODGE. And on a basis of 7,000; that is, the 3,500 Americans who are subject to be drafted are not to be drafted on a basis of 3,500 but on a basis of 7,000?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course.

Mr. LODGE. And, then, in addition there are the overestimates of population, to which the Senator has just referred.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The 3,500 citizens are just twice as bad off as they would be if all the employees of those factories were citizens, or if there were no aliens there; in other words, the aliens are counted to make up the population upon which the draft is based pro rata and then excluded from the service, and all the service that ought to be performed per capita by aliens is compelled to be performed by citizens; so that, instead of perhaps 1 in 15 being drafted, 1 in 7 is going to be drafted. No matter how patriotic men may be or how willing to submit their destiny to the turn of the wheel and to the gamble of the draft, they do not want to play with loaded dice, and they do not want to take twice the chance of being drawn to go to death and disease that a man has to take if he lives in some other State. To that extent, it seems to me, a tremendous wrong was committed, or, to put it most mildly, a great mistake was made in our draft law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. REED. When the bill was before the Military Committee I called attention to what was substantially the very thing the Senator is now speaking of. The point, perhaps, was slightly different, but it was the same in principle. It was explained by those who came there representing the War Department that, in their opinion, there was no practical way of avoiding the difficulty. I thought then, and I think now, that it would have been easy enough to do so; but I learned then, as I have been learning since and had learned before, that it is regarded as a kind of heresy for anybody to differ from department heads or chiefs who come here with a bill already written.

Of course, the matter the Senator sets forth is a matter of very serious complaint and ought not to have been.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have consulted with some of the military authorities about this matter; at least, I have taken a letter from the governor of my State, earnestly protesting against this inequality, and submitted it to one of the high military authorities. He thinks that, inasmuch as only 687,000 men are to be drafted in the first call, the inequality complained of will not be very serious when spread out over the entire country. But, be that as it may, there is no reason why men who have lived in this country and are living here, making their living out of this country, sending their children to our schools, paying taxes here, and accumulating property here, should not fight for the preservation of this country in this great emergency.

If there are any provisions in our treaties with foreign countries that their subjects residing in this country shall be exempt from draft, I have no doubt that as to the aliens residing in this country who are subjects of the countries with which we are in alliance in this war every single country would waive any exemption contained in such treaty; and, of course, the individual alien in this country could take no advantage of it if his country waived the treaty privilege.

Mr. President, without going into this matter to any great extent this morning, I send to the desk a resolution which I should like to have passed, in order that we may get whatever information may be available about the way these figures were made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 105), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby directed to furnish to the Senate information which will disclose the methods and plans or system used in estimating the population of cities and States for the purpose of the military draft or conscription by the Bureau of the Census, and also to transmit to the Senate said estimates of population.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator desires to speak on this resolution, I yield; certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I was going to speak with reference to it before it is adopted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. Then I will not ask action until after the Senator has concluded, of course.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my attention has been called also to these inequalities in the apportionment of the drafted men, and I made some inquiry about it this morning. I find that the figures which were used as a basis for distribution among the several States were furnished by the Census Bureau, and they will control that distribution. When it comes to the distribution among the several subdivisions of a State the quota which will be charged to each particular subdivision will be determined by the governor of the State.

There have been the same inequalities in Ohio as those referred to by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] in his own State. The population of Ohio, according to the Federal census of 1910, was, in round numbers, 4,770,000. The population of the State, which is used as a basis for calculation for determining the number of conscripts, was given by the Census Bureau as over 6,000,000.

My own city of Canton has, according to our best judgment, about 75,000 people. That is our judgment based upon the calculations made by the publishers of our city directory and by our school census. I think it is nearly correct. I am quite sure that the population does not exceed 80,000; but, according to the figures furnished by the Census Bureau, the city of Canton is given a population of 177,000. I knew Canton was a very prosperous city, but I did not realize that it had grown so rapidly during the few years that I have been here in Washington. My neighboring city of Akron, which has, according to our best judgment, about 125,000 people, certainly not to exceed 150,000—and its population has been growing by leaps and bounds—is credited by this estimate with 338,000 plus. The city of Cleveland, which has, I think, certainly about 800,000 people, is credited with 1,125,000. Of course this is going to work a great injustice to certain centers of population.

A newspaper from my home city gives the information that at the registration for voters last year there were—I am speaking from memory and my figures may not be exactly correct—something like 3,800 voters registered who were of conscription age, as determined by the military bill. Certainly there are not to exceed 4,000 voters of military age in the city. According to the figures that have been given out, we have about 10,000 men of conscription age in the city who registered under the draft law. I refer to this as illustrating some of the very strange mistakes that have been made by somebody.

I am also advised that the distribution of these conscripts among the several subdivisions of the States will be determined by the governor of each State, and he may use the figures which the Census Bureau has given him or he may use such other information as to him may seem persuasive and reliable.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this matter of the resident alien, which creates such injustice in the distribution of the draft, is a matter of very great importance. It has to be dealt with first by the Executice Department, because it will require treaty action or arrangement with those Governments that are engaged in the war with us against Germany. Of course, resident alien enemies come in a different category. Aliens ought not to be counted for the draft unless they are going to be drafted, and provision ought to be made for drafting them. If they will not serve in the armies of the countries of which they are citizens or subjects they ought to be exposed to the draft here, where they are earning money. The treaty arrangements ought to be made by the Executive; and if that were done we could very rapidly get legislation through Congress to bring them within the draft, which ought to be done, and done without delay.

As to the other point, Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent from the astonishing figures that have been given by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that northern cities and Northern States are having their census estimates padded in order to make their proportion of the draft heavier, whereas, as this statement of the World shows, those of the Southern States are being reduced by the same beneficent authority. We are accustomed to bearing the burden of taxes and seeing them spent somewhere else, but I think it is a little hard to have our census figures padded in order that we shall give more than our proportion of soldiers while other portions of the country give less.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator from Massachusetts any suggestion to make that would alleviate this situation and rectify this apparent wrong?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator means about the resident aliens?

Mr. KING. I refer to that and the other matter also.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has taken the first step by asking for these estimates of figures and how they were arrived at.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut does not go quite far enough.

Mr. LODGE. We must get the information, of course, before we can act. We want the figures before us, and getting that information is the first step. Then I think steps should be taken to correct the injustice. I have tried to indicate what we should do in regard to the matter of alien residents, which is a very great injustice indeed.

Mr. KING. I am sure there will be a disposition on the part of the Senators here to do all within their power to rectify any wrong that has been done.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there never has been a time when these foreigners could earn as many American dollars per day as they can now. They are reaping the benefit of this great war without suffering any of its consequences.

I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, if he has any information as to whether the Department of State has sounded any of the Governments with which we are in alliance to ascertain whether it would be agreeable to those countries to have their subjects drafted into the Army for the common defense? It seems to me that as long as the home governments are at war with the same enemy, they could have no objection to such an arrangement, and if there has been no suggestion it certainly would seem to me quite proper that this body should suggest to the State Department the propriety of ascertaining whether or not might draft foreigners into our armies to engage in our warfare in France.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, answering the Senator, and confining myself to his question, I will say I have not asked the State Department whether any Government has been sounded on the subject referred to by the Senator. Whether it has been done or not, I do not know.

As to what policy we might or should pursue with respect to drafting resident nationals of countries with which we are cooperating in this war, I will not at this moment express an opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STONE. I shall object to the consideration of——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This resolution simply calls for the census figures which determine the population of the States and cities.

Mr. LODGE. This has nothing to do with the matter of aliens.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; it has nothing whatever to do with the question of aliens.

Mr. STONE. This is not the resolution of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no. I am talking about the resolution that I offered, calling for the figures upon which the census was made for the purposes of draft.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Connecticut?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	Husting	Nelson	Smoot
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sterling
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Stone
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Thompson
Colt	Kellogg	Phelan	Tillman
Culberson	Kendrick	Pittman	Townsend
Cummins	Kenyon	Poindexter	Trammell
Curtis	King	Pomerene	Vardaman
Dillingham	La Follette	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Lewis	Reed	Warren
France	Lodge	Shafroth	Watson
Gore	McCumber	Sheppard	Weeks
Gronna	McKellar	Sherman	Williams
Harding	McNary	Shields

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the roll call 59 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 4961.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I know the Senator from Missouri wishes to go on, but will he allow me just to have a letter printed?

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. I spoke the other day against striking out the civil-service provision in the bill, put there by the House. Among the somewhat sophistical arguments that were made for that action that which seemed to me absolutely the most fallacious argument that could be made was one that the commission could not supply these places. I ventured to say that the commission was amply prepared to supply them. I have been given a copy of a letter addressed to Mr. LAGUARDIA, of the House of Representatives, signed by the president of the Civil Service Commission, Mr. McIlhenny. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD. It need not be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., June 20, 1917.

Hon. F. H. LAGUARDIA,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: This commission has the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of even date concerning the filling of positions under the food-control bill. You ask how long it will take to advertise these positions, hold examinations, and have the candidates ready for appointment.

For the various kinds of clerical positions mentioned by you, like general clerks, bookkeeper, stenographers, typewriters, etc., the commission is holding constant examinations now and has already existing registers of eligibles, and to these registers new names are being added daily. For the positions of inspector, examiner, expert, etc., it is likely that new examinations would be required; as to such positions, with the present demand of public and private employers for all kinds of employees, it is presumable that the Government would need practically all qualified and available persons, and in such event the commission is prepared to use the same methods that it has been using since the war began for other such positions in other lines of endeavor which the Government has undertaken; under these methods the commission is prepared to determine the qualifications of applicants daily as rapidly as applications are filed, and to furnish constantly to the appointing officer those who qualify.

It is manifest that, although several thousand employees may be required in connection with the administration of the food-control bill, no department or office would be able to absorb all these employees at one time and provide them with work.

The commission is satisfied that if these positions are to be filled with qualified persons they can be so filled more economically and promptly through this commission under the civil-service law than in any other way, because the commission with its well-established and comprehensive machinery is much better prepared than any other known agency to supply qualified persons for these positions.

For your interest and information the commission begs to inclose herewith a copy of a recent memorandum showing the preparedness of the commission to supply the Government with qualified persons for its work.

The commission begs further to call your attention to the fact that under opinion of the Attorney General of February 12, 1908 (28 Op., 507), it is necessary, in order to exempt positions from the requirements of the civil-service act and rules, that there be affirmative language to that effect. If there is no such language, the positions are subject to the usual civil-service requirements.

Very respectfully,

JOHN A. MCILHENNY, President.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to invite the attention of the Senate to the food administrator. I wish to make a very short statement and then to offer an amendment to the pending bill and to make some general observations.

There appears to be a strong sentiment in favor of limiting the provisions of the bill to the control of fuel and food, but that as to these articles the powers are to be very comprehensive. Whoever is intrusted to exercise powers which so vitally affect the entire 104,000,000 people of the United States ought to be qualified by scientific study and practical experience for the accomplishment of the task.

I therefore, Mr. President, intend to offer the following amendment, which I will read and then send to the desk and ask to have printed and to lie on the table until the present pending amendment can be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. REED. I propose to amend the present bill by striking out all of section 2 as amended and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

A board of food and fuel administration is hereby established. Said board shall consist of five members. The Secretary of Agriculture shall be ex officio a member of said board and shall act as chairman thereof. The other four members of said board shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. All of the members of said board shall be bona fide residents of the United States and qualified electors thereof. At least one of said members shall be a practical farmer. At least two of said members shall be presidents of land-grant colleges under the act approved July 2, 1862, and commonly known as the Morrill Act. Said presidents shall be selected from colleges located in the principal wheat-producing States. Not more than three of said five members shall belong to the same political party.

Mr. President, I ask to have the amendment printed for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. REED. I desire to proceed.

The choice must be made between one man and a board or commission of some kind. We all understand who the one man is to be.

This brings up sharply before us the question of the qualifications of Mr. Herbert C. Hoover.

It is our duty, before intrusting any man or board with the absolute control of all food and fuel of the people, to inquire regarding his qualifications. A failure to do so is criminal.

The fuel question is generally understood to be limited to coal, and it is further understood generally that the coal problem has been taken over by Mr. Peabody and Mr. Secretary Lane, and that it is not therefore one which will come under the control of Mr. Hoover.

I propose, therefore, to consider Mr. Hoover's qualifications as food administrator.

He actively seeks this position. He actively solicits the creation of the position. His efforts to influence congressional action have been bold, open, and notorious. J. Rufus Wallingford never walked into a community a stranger and within 24 hours startled it with elaborate schemes and within the next 24 hours further astonished it by an enormous organized working force as completely as has Mr. Hoover the American people.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. PHELAN. For a question. Is the Senator aware of the fact that Mr. Hoover came to Washington at the invitation of the President of the United States?

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, I know as much about that as the Senator does and as everybody else does. The question of the Senator does not throw any light on anything, and I proceed.

For weeks he has been assuming to be food dictator of the United States. It is therefore our duty to make two inquiries:

(1) What are the tasks to be accomplished? (2) What are Mr. Hoover's qualifications?

The tasks are (a) stimulation of production.

This embraces knowledge of American soil, climate, markets, and financing, including the habits and disposition of the American people.

Of all this Mr. Hoover is cheerfully ignorant.

The Secretary of Agriculture and the agricultural-school presidents named in my amendment will bring knowledge to the task.

(b) The transportation from producer to consumer.

This problem will hardly be assigned to Mr. Hoover, who, whatever his Belgian experience, has had none in the United States. It seems no one has the temerity to suggest Mr. Hoover for this part of the job.

The presidents of five great railway systems have been assigned to it.

(c) The prevention of hoarding and forestalling.

This is met by the Poindexter and Walsh amendment, already passed by the Senate.

(d) The prevention of gambling operations on the exchange.

This is accomplished by the Nelson amendment, already passed by the Senate.

It would even stop Hoover's activities.

(e) The prevention of a withdrawal of our goods by European buyers, with the attendant evil of unstable prices.

This power is already vested in the President and is being actually employed.

There remains only—

(f) Price fixing and regulation of consumption.

Now I lay down a few propositions:

I am unwilling to place the financial and industrial destiny of 45,000,000 farmers of the United States in the hands of any one man, be he resident or nonresident of this country.

I refuse to compel all the farmers of the United States to await Mr. Hoover's ukase before they dare to plant or sow.

I refuse to place the American consumer in a position where the prices he must pay may be reasonable or extortionate, as Hoover may decree.

I refuse to place the American citizen in a position where he may eat his bread in plenty or his crust in want, according to Hoover's dictation or the dictation of any other man born of woman.

Is Hoover even qualified to give advice?

If I wanted to learn how to produce a great wheat crop, I would call on great wheat farmers or agricultural experts.

If I wanted to know how to get the wheat to market, I would consult railway experts and wheat shippers.

If I wanted to know how to have wheat ground into flour, I would assemble representative millers.

If I wanted to know how to cook it and serve it, I would hire a chef or consult the good old mothers of Israel, who know more about cooking in five minutes than Hoover would know after a century of study.

Now, let us get at the experience of Mr. Hoover. While I speak of this I call your attention to his long nonresidence. I call your attention to the fact that he has been out of the United States practically all the time since he was 23 years of age; that almost every interest he has in the world is outside of the United States; that his brother, like himself, left the United States for other lands and has his home and his business in other lands.

I read from Who's Who of 1914 and 1915:

"Herbert Clark Hoover, engineer; born West Branch Iowa, August 10, 1874.

"Mining engineer; graduate of Stanford University, Cal., in 1895.

"Assistant Arkansas Geological Survey in 1893; United States Geological Survey, Sierra Nevada Mountains, 1895; assistant manager of Carlisle mines, New Mexico, and Morning Star mines, California, 1896."

That terminates his American connection.

"In West Australia as chief of the mining staff of Berwick, Moreing & Co., and manager Hannan's Brown Hill mine, 1897." At that time, as I figure it in my head, he was 23 years old.

"He was manager of Sons of Gwalia and E. Murchison mines, 1898." That is an Australian mining institution.

"Chief engineer Chinese Imperial Bureau of Mines, 1899, doing extensive exploration in interior of China. Took part in defense of Tientsin during Boxer disturbances, 1900. Representative of bondholders in construction of Ching Wang Tow Harbor, 1900; general manager Chinese Engineering & Mining Co., 1901; partner Berwick, Moreing & Co., mine operators, London, 1902–1908; director or managing director Zinc Corporation (Ltd.), Kyshtim Corporation (Ltd.), Tanalky Corporation (Ltd.), Granville Mining Co. (Ltd.), Oroya Exploration Co. (Ltd.), Chinese Engineering & Mining Co. (Ltd.), Russo-Asiatic Corporation (Ltd.), General Petroleum Co., and so forth, 1908–1913." This latter company the only American institution of the lot.

He was trustee of the Stanford University. That is an American connection, whatever importance it may have; but he was also "fellow of the Royal Geographical Society; member of the American Institute of Mining Engineers, Societé Ingenieurs Civils de France, and so forth. Societé Belge des Ingenieurs et des Industriel; Mining and Metal Society; A. A. A. S. Hakinyt Society; and so forth. Clubs: Devonshire, Albemarle, Ranelagh (London), City (New York). Author: Economics of Mining (joint author), 1906; Principles of Mining, 1909. Translator: Agricola's de re Metallica, 1912. Contributor to technical publications. Home: Red House, Hornton Street, London. Offices: 1 London Wall Buildings, London, E. C., England; 71 Broadway, New York; Mills Building, San Francisco."

Every single one of the companies in the list I have read, except the General Petroleum Co., are English companies with property in China or Russia or Australia or some other foreign country. I have the details with reference to them here, which I have obtained from the Mining Manual of Great Britain.

In this connection it is interesting to note that Mr. Hoover's brother has likewise practically severed all his American connections. His name appears in Who's Who. I shall only call attention to it at this time to say that he seems to be interested in the same companies largely as Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, and, like Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, he has his home in London and his offices in London.

His residence is in London and his offices in London.

I call attention to some of these companies. For instance, the company known as the Chinese Engineering & Mining Co. (Ltd.). I read from the Mining Manual and Mining Year Book, at page 137, for the year 1917, and it is an English publication:

The object of the reconstruction—

That is, of this company—was to remove the competition and work in unison with the Lanchow Mining Co., a company owning collieries, etc., in the same district. Under this arrangement the business of the two companies are to be combined and worked as one.

So it appears Mr. Hoover is engaged in stifling competition in the coal markets of China.

In some of these companies I find that his associate directors are barons and dukes. There is one I want to call attention to, in which V. U. Romanoff appears. It is a Russian company. Whether that is the Czar or some of the Czar's relatives deponent saith not. Senators will find it very interesting to note this illustrious collection of illustrious nobles, and so forth.

These companies are interested in all kinds of mines, coal, gold, copper, lead, and zinc, and it would appear that our genial friend branched out and extended his promotions over all the world, except America, from which he has been conspicuously absent, both in person and in investments, for a number of years.

I read from Mr. Hoover's own testimony given before the House of Representatives.

Page 12, transcript of the record of the hearings before the House of Representatives:

Now, as to the problems in this country, I feel myself very much of a stranger in my own country, as I have been away since the war began.

But he had been away long before the war began. He had been away from the country a period nearly equal to his total age when he left this country. He left at 23, and, according to all the data I am able to get, has been absent substantially 20 years. His business while away is told in the Saturday Evening Post of June 25 in a fulsomely eulogistic article from the pen of Mr. Irwin.

I read a clause:

He left China to form in London a partnership with an Englishman. The foundation of this firm was in the Chinese coal fields; but they branched out into other quarters of the world. It is hard to describe in one word Hoover's niche in the mining industry. He describes himself as a mining engineer; and, indeed, he is among the leaders in that profession. Yet he was from this time forth an entrepreneur—to use a French word for which we have no exact equivalent.

But we do have something that is mighty near an equivalent for entrepreneur as the word is translated to me; and that word is "promoter." I am not a French scholar, and my translator may have been in error, so I reserve the right of correction; but I see my friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who knows all tongues and all languages, dead or living, and I refer the matter to him. So we may understand why Mr. Hoover is connected with so many companies. I continue the reading:

He laid out mining enterprises, found the capital for them, and managed them. Perhaps that old western phrase "just mining man" describes him best of all.

Further on in the article it is said:

There followed 10 years or so in which Hoover's activities reached every corner of the globe. He was interested in Australia, China, Peru, California, Mexico, Alaska, South Africa, Burma, and Belgium. One of the firms for which he was executive head was mining in Borneo, where American superintendents and foremen ruled over a working force of head hunters.

Perhaps there is where was born the idea of being supreme boss to regulate the diet of people.

Here we have a reference to his connection with the deposed Romanoff family:

A Russian nobleman had a principality rich in coal and iron. He wanted it developed. In view of existing Russian laws it seemed better to lease the whole principality outright, so Hoover's company is still running not only the mines but the farms of this estate.

I omit parts of this interesting article, which is elegantly written, as everything Mr. Irwin writes is elegantly done.

He was, above all things, an organizer. The best thing he did was to take a large property that had not been paying and by readjusting its parts make it pay. Such a talent is especially useful in the field of base metals—

And so forth.

Mr. President, after having spread himself all over the world in this most interesting and illustrious manner it appears that he settled down in England. Indeed, his business connections and interests for the past 20 years have been English. Mr. Irwin remarks:

His house in Kensington—a country mansion of the eighteenth century, its walled garden now surrounded by the shops and flats of High Street and that vicinity—gathered mightily entertaining dinner parties, the industrial knights errant of the world, crossing through the industrial capital of the world on their way between California and the East Indies, Afghanistan and New York, Johannesburg and Alaska.

And note this pregnant sentence regarding this gentleman, who left our country 20 years ago, who has sojourned in England, and who has his home in England:

When asked in England to define his political opinions he called himself—

A Democrat? No. He called himself a Progressive? No. He called himself a Republican? No. He called himself a Socialist? No—

He called himself a Liberal—

Of course that makes no difference to the stomach that has been properly trained to take whatsoever is offered—

He called himself a Liberal and let it go at that, only his was an advanced liberalism, looking forward to a better organization of free society, not backward to an unsystematic freedom. More and more his own country drew him—

Says this author. Then he says:

"I want to get into the big game at home"—

This country was drawing him when the "big game" was on—

"I want to get into the big game at home," he said once, in the year before the war, "not the money game either, and not exactly the political game, but the big game and the real game somewhere."

Whatever that means I do not intend to interpret; he must have meant the game of food dictator; but I follow on. Further in this article the statement is made:

The Government had been watching him, and especially that quiet gentleman who looks round for the President—

Well, comment is unnecessary; it would be superfluous—

His friends felt sure that when the declaration came his services would be claimed in some capacity or other. The fact was, as I think Hoover well knew, that if the American Government did not call on him our allies would. Already two important posts in the civilian conduct of the war had been offered him by the British. But to "go British" openly—

And notice this. He would not have refused, according to this author, because he was an American, but here is the reason:

But to "go British" openly in those days of our neutrality would have wrecked the commission. Not only would it have taken away the head of the work, but it would have proved to the German militarist mind that the commission was not neutral—that its agents were simply "a hundred allied spies."

Further, Hoover would have been obliged to surrender his American citizenship; and he was not willing to do that. Had he stepped into a job of munitions management at the beginning of the war—and he had the chance—he would be one of the greatest ones of England now—Sir Herbert Hoover, doubtless, with a peerage coming to him after the war. To anyone with social ambition—for the socially ambitious American dearly loves a title—this would have been an inducement. I can say, without reserve, that it was no inducement to Hoover.

So, Mr. President, I pass from that, and let it rest upon the minds and consciences of Senators whether they are prepared to turn 45,000,000 American farmers and all the vast American consuming public over to the control of a gentleman, however good he may be, who has been a nonresident of our country, whose home is in the city of London, and whose interests are in London and China and Australia and Russia, and perhaps elsewhere.

Mr. President, there has been much said about speculation in the wheat market; there has been much said about the evil speculators running up the prices to the American people. I have voted, as nearly every other Senator here has voted, for a bill to give the President the right to shut every exchange in this country if gambling is permitted. I have urged here in the Senate, however, that the great cause of the rise of prices of American foodstuffs—not the entire cause but one of the great causes—was in the cornering of American foodstuffs by those who represented foreign buyers; but I was not prepared to understand that Mr. Hoover had been a leader in that movement; I was not prepared to know that Mr. Hoover had deliberately "rigged" the American market on foodstuffs; I was not prepared to understand that, if there had been such a thing as gambling in foodstuffs in the American exchanges, Herbert C. Hoover was the chief gambler of the food and wheat pits of America.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask my brother Senator has he some facts upon that subject?

Mr. REED. I generally have some facts when I make an assertion like that.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator may rest assured—I was about to conclude my sentence—that if he has some facts about that very matter that he could submit at this time they would be very interesting.

Mr REED. I am about to submit them.

Mr. LEWIS. I will be a very patient listener.

Mr. REED. Of course, I have not any sworn testimony, but I have some evidence here which I do not think will be disputed. I will read from the Saturday Evening Post of date May 26, 1917, an article by Mr. Ernest Poole, an article beautifully written and well illustrated, one of the series of articles that appeared in the Saturday Evening Post to prepare the American mind for the reception of Mr. Hoover; an article so skillfully written and put forth that it had the effect of not only preparing the American mind, but of preparing the senatorial stomach. I read a paragraph. Of course, we all know that the place foods were obtained for the Belgians was in America:

Nor was it only a problem of feeding. One-half of the Belgians were out of work; and there were the regular paupers—the blind, the orphans, and the helpless. Three million five hundred thousand people in Belgium and 2,000,000 more in northern France were wholly destitute. They must be clothed with millions of garments, warmed by thousands of tons of coal, and those who are homeless must be housed. New committees constantly had to be formed. In the presence of diminished shipping the inward flow of food must increase. It must be done cheaply and without fail. And in order to save every possible dollar, only those kinds of foods must be bought that would give the greatest nourishment. This they learned from expert dieticians.

But, as to purchasing supplies, there were big men on the C. R. B.—

That is, the Commission for Relief of Belgium—who needed no expert advice. They knew all the tricks of the business.

Now notice, O ye of little faith. Where is my friend from Illinois, who wanted the evidence?

When the price of beans began to rise they bought 1,000 tons of beans and threw them back in one lot on the market. Down went prices. They bought in small lots. Slowly again the price began rising; but once more the terrific impact of 1,000 tons of beans was felt. Again the price dropped, and again their agents bought beans in small lots.

So again and again did that same 1,000 tons of beans hammer down prices and save the day. The same was true wherever they went. In food and in shoes and clothing, repeatedly, through expert advice of business men as shrewd as themselves, they went into the market and bought at cost, and often below it.

Now, if Mr. Joseph Leiter, recently the entertainer of Italian princes, had been as successful and as well informed and as well backed with money when in 1902 he started to corner the wheat market in Chicago, but lost out because the other fellows were too strong for him—if he had been as well advised and as well financed as Mr. Hoover was in this enterprise, and had known the game as well, he might have cornered the market over and over again.

I want the American people now to understand, if this article is to be credited—and it has been printed now since the 26th day of May and never denied, to my knowledge—that one of the men who ran prices up to the consumers of this country, who put the price of beans where they were prohibitive, was Mr. Hoover, who was engaged in gambling operations and "rigging" the market to an extent never before known to the American people. I want it understood that it is proposed to turn over to him the destiny of the farmer and of the consumer alike; and I want those of you who have stood in the Senate, black in the face from the very pressure of your enthusiasm in prating of the virtues of Mr. Hoover and also denouncing the food gamblers and demanding the penitentiary, the scaffold, the torch, the thumbscrew, for them—I want you to go back to your people and tell them you have picked out the man whose eulogist certifies that he is the most important and successful of all the food gamblers of 1916.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I do for a question.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I observe in one of these historical recitations concerning Mr. Hoover that it is said of Mr. Hoover that the fortunes he made in these speculations were at once converted into food, and by that method he saved the people of Belgium. Assuming that to be true, does that mitigate, in the mind of the Senator, the offense to which he alludes, or is he willing to accept that, if such be true, as an excuse for the speculative enterprise on the part of Mr. Hoover?

Mr. REED. No, sir. I do not accept it as an excuse. I desire, however, to be understood. I have not intimated here that Mr. Hoover conducted these operations for his own emolument and profit. On the other hand, everything I have said has been plainly to the intent that what he did he did as the representative of this fund. I do not claim that he took a single penny of profit to himself; but I deny, sir, that it is right to "rig" the market of 104,000,000 people and put provender at a starvation point in order to make gambling profits to feed the people of some other land. I deny it. It has absolutely no palliation. It is wrong and wicked to go into gambling operations, particularly in the foods of a people. It is vicious and wrong to do it, because it robs and despoils innocent people. What good does it do the mother of New York City, whose children, we are told, are hungry; or the mother of Philadelphia, whose children some Senators have said are hungry; or the mothers of other American cities to know, as their children lift to them the pallid lips of want and cry for bread, that some successful and shrewd gambler has gone into the American market and run up the price of food to American children and carried the profits to a foreign land, however much that foreign land may be entitled to our sympathy and love? But, worse than that, large portions of this money were contributed by America. We therefore are presented with the spectacle of the money contributed by America being used to impoverish the children of America.

But I read further. This particular exposition I have read seemed to be confined to beans, along with a general phrase covering foodstuffs. In the New York American of to-day appears this statement on page 3:

It is admitted that Mr. Hoover's administration of the affairs of the Belgium relief commission was a success—a greater success than ever achieved before in a like enterprise. It is not only a success as a worthy and appealing charity but a success as a business enterprise. It was pointed out by Mr. Hoover's lieutenants on his return to this country that he had made money—millions of dollars—by shrewd buying and manipulation of the supplies of the commission. At times the relief was on a self-supporting basis.

Mr. Hoover is said to have made more money and turned it back into the relief fund than the total subscriptions from the United States, which amounted to about $9,000,000 of the $250,000,000 given for the relief of Belgium during his administration, and that the "American" part of the relief fund was, in fact, chiefly the work of Mr. Hoover.

Mr. President, never in the history of this world before this event has any man stood at the wheat and produce exchanges of America with $250,000,000 at his command. Never before has any man with that tremendous power been able to buy immense quantities of foodstuffs, and then, when the price had been advanced, to hurl them suddenly upon the market and break the market, then to buy in again at cheap prices and hurl again this enormous amount upon the market and break the market.

Mr. President, I challenge the doubting Thomases of this body to call an investigation, put Mr. Hoover on the stand, go to the bottom of this question, and see whether or not Mr. Hoover was engaged in forestalling the markets of America and whether or not he is one of the chief instruments in bringing about that very deplorable condition which is now offered as the excuse for this legislation.

Senators may not listen now, but the day is coming when the American people will hear. I call your attention to a statement appearing in Mr. Hoover's letter to the President of July 11. Note the language. In a moment I shall show you its importance. It is headed "Producers without a voice":

3. During recent months the allied governments have consolidated their buying into one hand in order that they might relieve the burden of speculation from their own consumers, and as the restricted exports to neutrals are but a minor item, the export price, if not controlled, is subject to the will of the allied buyer, so that in a great measure the American producer is left to that buyer's judgment and is without voice.

That is the dark picture which Mr. Hoover paints of the present situation. He goes on to say:

We must, therefore, expect a glut in our interior terminals during a considerable period. The financial resources of the grain trade are probably insufficient to carry this extra load without the help of speculators, and, moreover, the consolidation of practically all foreign buying in the hands of the allied buyer has further tended to diminish the resources of capital available by putting a number of firms out of business and limits the financial capital available in export trade.

And therefore Mr. Hoover goes on to say that because these conditions have come about we must protect the farmer.

There is no candid man living who will read this letter who will not be forced to the conclusion that Mr. Hoover deliberately intended to say to the American people that an evil condition had been created for the American farmer by the fact that all of the foreign purchasers were to buy through one agency, and that thereby the farmer had been deprived of his market, and because this evil had been put upon us it was necessary for Congress to act and pass this bill.

I charge that Mr. Hoover is himself the author of the condition of which he complains, and that having brought about the condition against which he now inveighs, he proceeds to ask for this great power in order to meet the very condition he caused.

Let us see. I read from his testimony given before the House committee. Let me read enough to give you the full context:

One of the prime causes for the extraordinarily high prices in this country has been the competitive bidding between the allies and between different branches of the one ally in these markets for foodstuffs.

He failed to say that he had been one of the bidders or at the head of the syndicate that did the bidding.

The wheat has now been consolidated into an international body called the "wheat executive." It controls, I estimate roughly, about 80 or 90 per cent of the wheat buying for the allies. There are still, however, four bodies buying independently in competition with the wheat executive. In the fats I calculated there are 14 different organs competing in this market for fats on behalf of the allies. Now, before we can move one step in this country to remedy price conditions, protect our own consumers, and protect them from extravagant prices and speculation, we have got to induce them to get that buying, at least commodity by commodity, all into one hand in order that we may have one hand to deal with.

Going on, he states:

The plan I proposed was that we should create in that particular a small board which for lack of a better name we would call the food strategy board, the members of the board to be chosen by the food controllers of each country. The board * * * would simply plan the origin of the food supplies for the European allies as between all of the different sources and would determine its distribution as between the different allies, and once it had made its determination it would hand the actual operation from the European allied point of view over to functions like the wheat executive to purchase that wheat and distribute it.

Now, notice this:

We on this side need to set up, obviously, some organization for food control in order that we may deal with that particular situation among others. Now, just in passing, in setting up an implement of that kind among the allies, we will have set up a dangerous implement for our own country unless we participate in its control. I might point out to you that if any of you gentlemen or myself held that position of the single buying agent with a four months' supply of wheat behind us, as they will have, or other cereals when their harvest comes in, we could probably drop the price of wheat in this country to 75 cents a bushel.

Of course he knew what he was talking about. He had been buying and selling beans and other foodstuffs.

I put it now to the Senate of the United States: Dare you, dare we, give the power to one man to put the price of wheat to the farmer down to 75 cents a bushel? Dare you, dare we, as custodians of the public welfare, give that power to any human being? Has such a power ever been given by a free people to any man?

It was once exercised in this world by old Pharaoh. Pharaoh got control of the supplies of corn, and when he had ceased bargaining with the people, who came with hungry lips and cried, "Oh, Pharaoh, give us corn!" he owned all of the horses and cattle, he owned all of the silver and gold, he owned all of the flocks and herds, he owned all of the men and women who formed the teeming population of the valley of the Nile; and from that day to this Egypt has walked with bowed head and broken heart. In her sad eyes the light of hope has never flashed. From her brain no spark of genius has ever come. Dead as are the rocks of her mighty monuments, she lies a shriveled mummy at the gateway of human life like the entrance to a sepulcher.

Seventy-five cent wheat! Do you dare put the power in one man? And Mr. Hoover says the power is there. But what think you, now, of presenting to the American farmer, as he did in his letter to the President for publication, the idea that the American farmer has been deprived by evil fortune, by evil conditions, of a market, of a competitive market, of a market in which the world competed, and this brought about by the concentration into one hand of the purchasing power for all of the foreign countries? And yet the scheme was suggested in this testimony that he gave before the House.

I now call your attention, sir, to his testimony given before the Senate committee in answer to a question which I asked him in which he specifically advocated the very same thing, and boasted in a modest way, as I read his testimony, that he already had it under way of accomplishment. Parallel, oh ye gentlemen of the press, who bear to the country the news on which the country forms its judgment—parallel, if you will, these words in which Hoover, in his letter to the President, practically limits the laws of competition in our American markets, with this part of his testimony that appears on pages 40 and 41 of Part I of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I was asking a question. I read the latter part of it:

I understand you to say that there ought to be a plan by which the food for the allies should be purchased through some agency cooperating with our Government?

Mr. HOOVER. Yes.

Senator REED. What would be the object of that, please?

Mr. HOOVER. The object of this is primarily to stop rival bidding by the different allies and their agents in all markets.

Senator REED. Has that taken place in the past?

Mr. HOOVER. To an enormous extent.

Senator REED. Did that take place when wheat rose to the great price that it did in May?

I might have included beans.

Mr. HOOVER. There was rival buying of wheat and flour by different agencies of the allies at that very moment.

Senator REED. As a matter of fact, they are supposed to have purchased and held throughout the year something over 100,000,000; is not that true?

Mr. HOOVER. I do not know the details of their operations.

Senator REED. But you do know their biddings or buyings were very large?

Mr. HOOVER. Yes, sir.

Now, returning again to the subject:

Senator REED. And you do say you desire the power now to have the purchases for the allies made through one common agency, in order to stop that great element of speculation?

Mr. HOOVER. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. And you think that is very necessary and very essential?

Mr. HOOVER. I do.

Senator REED. Would you include in that the sale of all wheat and other grains that you propose to control that go to neutral countries?

Mr. HOOVER. I think it will be necessary to control neutral buying.

Senator REED. Then, your proposition is to put into the hands of this agency all export business?

Mr. HOOVER. In wheat, at least.

Senator REED. There is no doubt, is there, Mr. Hoover, about the fact that the allies have it within their own power to purchase through one common agency at the present time?

Mr. HOOVER. They have now arranged one common agency.

Senator REED. It is arranged?

Mr. HOOVER. Yes.

Senator REED. That agency is already in voluntary cooperation with your committees, is it not?

Mr. HOOVER. No; we have no arrangement with them whatever; until we have some legal position we can not enter into any arrangement. Just on that point I might mention that the most dangerous thing that might happen to this country is to allow even our own allies to have the unrestricted run of our market.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. Just one moment. Now, Mr. President, along with the statement Mr. Hoover makes here that it is highly desirable that we have one purchasing agent, that the rival bidding of all the world and of each part of the world shall be stopped in our markets, and that all buying shall be done through one, I call attention to his statement to the President that producers are without a voice, and that during recent months the allies' Governments have consolidated their buyings, and that therefore the American people are deprived of the benefit of rival buying.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GORE. I have been informed that J. Ogden Armour is the representative of the allies, and their purchasing agent for wheat in the United States, and that he put the price of wheat down to $2. I was wondering if the Senator had any information upon that point?

Mr. REED. I have not, except rumor.

A little further on in this testimony I find this interesting datn. I am reading from pages 43 and 44:

Senator REED. It was, as I understood you to say, the buying of the allies, bidding against each other in the markets of this country, that was one of the great forces in running up prices to what we regarded as extortionate?

Mr. HOOVER. That was one of the forces.

Senator REED. And if we could eliminate that feature entirely from our markets it would go a long way toward stabilizing prices, would it not?

Mr. HOOVER. It would if the implement were carefully handled. It requires a great deal of care in its manipulation.

Senator REED. Of course, everything, we understand, must be handled in the right way or it might produce serious results. But I am assuming we have good and capable management. It was because the allies were buying in such large quantities and because they had practically an unlimited power of consumption that they were able to so seriously affect our markets. That is the case, is it not?

Mr. HOOVER. That is one of the factors; but always bear in mind that the speculative elements in this country, knowing the situation in Europe and knowing the intention of the allies to acquire grain, themselves entered upon this situation and boosted the price even against the allies.

There is a little more of this testimony that I desire to incorporate in the RECORD without reading. I will hand it to the reporter, marked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senator REED. Certainly; the allies bid against the local speculator and the local speculator against the allies?

Mr. HOOVER. And they all bid against our millers.

Senator REED. Let us see, Mr. Hoover, if that is accurate. Of course I am not challenging any statement you make, but is it not true that the great grain dealers of our country were bears on the market and had been persistently bears for the last year?

Mr. HOOVER. Well, that is a statement of fact I can not tell you anything about. You would have to canvass to find out, even if you could.

Senator REED. I thought perhaps you were in error in your former statement to the committee, and it now appears you do not claim to have investigated the matter. But that is all right.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, I return again to the proposition: What man is there, in view of Mr. Hoover's own testimony, that dares give to him this right to control the American market and furnish him with $150,000,000 from the pockets of the taxpayers of this country to employ in the wheat markets or elsewhere as he sees fit?

Is not this situation the most startling thing ever proposed to the American people? Here is a man whose eulogists say he successfully cornered the bean market, and that he made over $9,000,000 in food speculations in America. Here is a man who tells us that that power can be so exercised as to bring wheat down to 75 cents a bushel. Here is a man who helped rig and corner and control our markets, according to his eulogists. Here is a man who helped bring about the common buying, through one common agency, of all the countries of Europe—and I do not say that was wrong—but who, having brought it about or helped to bring it about, and having advised it, then turns to the American public and warns the American farmer that he now has no foreign market, and therefore this bill must be passed. And here is the man that is already engaged in and assuming the duties of this office that has not yet been created and that I pray may never be created.

I hold in my hand a letter sent out by Morton & Co., commission merchants of St. Louis. It is their special letter, sent to the trade, on wheat. It contains a telegram addressed to H. C. Hoover, Washington, D. C.:

Situation regarding new wheat in this district becoming critical. Many country shippers here, and receivers have numerous letters stating thrashing becoming general; they must do something, and ask us what. Millers', country dealers', and farmers' hands tied. Can't you outline tentative plans or suggest price basis to bridge over period until legislation passed? Serious disaffection among farmers certain. Exchange congestion likely in short time. Partial if not complete disruption country grain trade probable unless have something to work on in next day or two. All grain firms anxious to cooperate and assist to limit our ability.

The following is his reply received to-day—states the writer of this letter—the letter is dated July 13:

Telegram from 14 firms at St. Louis received here Monday. It is reported in New York that the Wheat Export Co. have announced their willingness to buy some wheat, basis $1.80 St. Louis and Chicago and $1.75 Kansas City, delivery July and first half August, so evidently there is some market, at least for wheat. I am powerless to act at all until Congress grants some authority.

HERBERT C. HOOVER.

The writer of this letter makes this comment:

The Wheat Export Co. is the buyer for all the allies—

Now, that is the company that is offering $1.80 and $1.75; and this buyer for all the allies, mark you, was created, or at least advised and consented to, by Mr. Hoover. This writer says—

The Wheat Export Co. is the buyer for all the allies, and the main question is whether it is to be taken as a hint to the trade of what can be expected, if ever the law is passed legalizing the present commission for food control. If it is, the danger of loading up at present prices is apparent.

We think that it will be the custom next week for all sales to be made with the dockage percentage deducted from the gross weight of the car. Therefore your purchases from the farmer should be made with the expectation of losing the dockage. You should clean the wheat before shipping, for you will lose the freight charges—

And so forth.

That is a page of a letter that was sent out to the trade, and that was sent to me by a gentleman who got hold of it. Observe that already Mr. Hoover is sending out word to the trade that there is a price suggested and that there is a purchaser, and that purchaser happens to be the purchaser for the allies; and the American farmer is told that he can sell there, if nowhere else, and at a price they fix.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I observed in the press this morning that the leaders upon each side of the Senate had agreed upon another bill. I have not had the privilege of seeing the bill. Is the Senator from Missouri familiar with the bill which the leaders upon the different sides of the Senate have agreed upon?

Mr. REED. I am not, sir. I am not a leader.

Mr. BORAH. It had occurred to me that it might be possible that the leaders on the different sides of the Senate had obviated some of these difficulties, and that it might be well to find out, if we could, who they are, and ascertain, if they will permit us to know, what the contents of the bill are.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, not having arrived at that period of development when I am entitled to sit in the councils of the leaders, I can not answer. The only light that I have to guide me is the very dull and inefficient light of my reason and the old lamp of experience, and occasionally I read something; but I am never informed from the high sources of authority just what is going on.

Mr. BORAH. I shall pursue the inquiry elsewhere, and see if I may learn what our leaders have agreed upon.

Mr. REED. This whole question of leadership brings to my mind, however, the old story of the court room one morning when the judge said that he was astounded to find that the leader of the bar had purloined some papers from court, and every lawyer in court rose up and called the judge a liar in his own right. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, it is easy to create power. It is hard to recall it. I want to read you a speech that was made in New York by one of Mr. Hoover's advisers, coadjutors, henchmen, or whatever you may see fit to term him. As I read it I want to know if there is a man in this Chamber who will not resent its cool impudence. It would be resented if it were read by the captain of a company of Prussian soldiers to a body of starving civilians upon the streets of Berlin.

July 13, 1917—

An account which I missed, but which is from the New York Sun. I read the headlines:

Hoover will try patriotism first—If Nation does not economize, then he will quickly invoke law—Requa tells of plans—Increase of fruit and vegetable diet and waste elimination primary necessities.

Those are the headlines. Let me read this all to you:

When Congress passes the food-control bill it is the intention of Herbert C. Hoover, who will be appointed national food administrator, to restrain his whip hand as long as possible—

To restrain his whip hand as long as possible!

relying upon the patriotism of the American people to obey his war emergency and conservation plans.

This affirmation of Mr. Hoover's confidence in the self-sacrifice of the country was announced yesterday along with a general outline of the food administrator's plans when the food bill becomes a law by Marc L. Requa at a conference of the Merchants' Association in the Woolworth Building. Mr. Requa, who is Mr. Hoover's personal representative—

I wonder where he got Mr. Requa?

Mr. Requa, who is Mr. Hoover's personal representative, came from Washington to address the food-problem committee of the association, which met in the assembly room.

I may argue myself unknown by saying that I do not know who Mr. Requa is. There are many very eminent men in this country with whom I am not acquainted, but does anyone here know who Mr. Requa is? I read on—

"The food administrator will cooperate with the public"—

How fortunate the public is. The food administrator is going to cooperate with it—

"to eliminate the speculator and stabilize operations," said Mr. Requa.

Of course, Mr. Hoover might, if these words of this eulogist of his be true, at least contribute by withdrawing himself from that particular market which is denominated speculation. But I read on—

He will urge that the diet of the Nation be readjusted so as to conserve nonperishable foods for shipment abroad. In order to do this Americans will have to learn to eat a greater amount of fresh fruit and vegetables, something they do not do now—

And understand they will have to learn it, and understand in the meantime while Mr. Hoover is retaining his whip hand long enough, as long as it is possible relying upon your obedience. I continue the reading, but will go back a line so as to get the context, for I would have none of this lost—

In order to do this Americans will have to learn to eat a greater amount of fresh fruit and vegetables, something they do not do now, as the average person here consumes only 14 per cent of this kind of food in his daily bill of fare.

So these American people are to eat more vegetables or perchance Hoover will not restrain the whip hand. But I continue—

"Every trade will be asked to appoint a national committee to work in unison with the Government and these national councils will be expected to cooperate with local trade committees to regulate prices and consumption. If these plans are carried out, as Mr. Hoover believes they will be cheerfully," Mr. Requa told the food problem committee yesterday "it would not be necessary to use the power expected to be vested in Mr. Hoover by Congress."

If you do what Mr. Hoover tells you to do, it will not be necessary to use the power. So a slave driver might have announced to his fifty or hundred negroes as he sent them into the cotton field of a morning, "If you pick cotton thus and so and demean yourselves according to the rules that I make, I shall not whip you when you return to-night; but if you do not, I then shall find it necessary to use the power I have."

This man comes here with these views. Where did he get them? Where did he get the idea that he could use power on the Amercian people? Was it in Borneo? Was it when he sojourned with the headmen? Was it when he dwelt in China? Was it when he drove the coolies that he got the idea he could control American citizens in that way?

If these terms of Mr. Hoover are carried out cheerfully, Mr. Requa told the food-problem committee yesterday, it would not be necessary to use the power expected to be vested in Mr. Hoover by Congress.

I say now the man who will vote to give Mr. Hoover power after that statement unless it be repudiated is unworthy a seat in the American Congress.

Further on—

The food administrator has confidence that the people will govern themselves even to the extent of material personal sacrifices.

"The public," said Mr. Requa, "must be taught conservation of food which is not perishable, and must get it ready for shipment abroad."

We must be taught by this man who has lived abroad all his own life, the American public must be taught; and yet I have not affected the stomach of you all, but ostrichlike you will trust to the processes of a digestion that has never been defeated.

Mr. Requa—

This personal representative of Mr. Hoover—impressively informed his auditors yesterday that the Government food administrators realize the power of the weapon which may be intrusted to them by Congress.

Mr. GORE. Of the weapon?

Mr. REED. Yes; of the weapon.

Mr. Requa impressively informed his auditors yesterday that the Government food administrators realize the power of the weapon which may be intrusted to them by Congress. Mr. Hoover really has confidence, he said, that it will not be necessary to use it except when local organizations ask for the Government's assistance in disciplining some recalcitrant member.

If King George had asserted that power, the Declaration of Independence would probably have mentioned that one count in the indictment the fathers brought against his government and omitted all others, for it would have overshadowed them all.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GORE. I merely wish to say, perhaps that is the reason why Mr. Hoover came to the Capitol last Friday and argued in favor of the pending bill and against the substitute, on the ground that the substitute did not convey sufficient power.

Mr. REED. I read on:

"The conditions in our lifetime never will be the same again," said Mr. Requa. "The sooner we realize the truth of this the better, and the sooner will Americans abandon the wasteful practices characteristic of the American Nation. War has changed the international situation. This war will end with European nations in a state of undreamed-of efficiency. As a nation we must be able to compete with that efficiency if we are to hold our share of the trade after the war."

Then he goes on and adds:

We are no longer a pioneer Nation.

That is true, but in some parts of this Nation the spirit of the pioneer yet lives.

We have no frontiers, no vast areas of unsettled land. We produce more than we consume. We must export this excess or our expansion will strangle. It is up to us to show that as a democracy we are partiotic enough to sacrifice everything for our country and stand ready to organize so thoroughly and cheerfully that we can combat successfully—without being driven by authority, the soulless and rigid discipline which characterizes the rule of autocracy.

That is an implied threat, without being driven by this hand in which is now the whip that is being withheld.

Mr. President, I am aware that I have talked upon this bill to the complete weariness of the Senate, but not more to their weariness than to my own. I have felt that some one ought to voice a protest against turning over to any man powers such as these; and if there were none of the leaders of the Senate, none of the eloquent champions of world democracy to defend our own democracy and liberty, I must perforce lift my voice again and yet again in the hope that I may be heard, if for nothing else, for my much speaking.

Mr. President, I shall not object to Mr. Hoover or anybody else advising the American people; but if we are to spend $150,000,000, I really think we ought to give somebody the job of food advisor who knows a little something about it.
